The Central Council tried to sue Hohmann, but the courts determined that his remarks were not a statutory offence.

Spiegel has had his differences with Schroeder, too, particularly Schroeder's blanket opposition to the Iraq war.

"The concentration camps were not liberated by peace demonstrations, but by the Red Army," Spiegel said.

The mainstream parties now are competing to form coalitions with smaller parties so they can lay final claim to the election victory. Both have ruled out cooperation with the new Left Wing party, leaving the free-market Free Democratic Party and the Green Party up for grabs.

Passover massacre mastermind convicted

A Palestinian terrorist was found guilty of planning a deadly suicide bombing against Israelis. Abbas Al-Sayed was convicted in a Tel Aviv District Court of dispatching the terrorist who blew himself up in a Netanya hotel on Passover eve in 2002, killing 30 other people. Sayed, a Hamas chief in Tulkarm, was also found guilty of masterminding a similar attack in Netanya in 2001 that killed five people. He is expected to receive several consecutive life prison sentences.

Israel seeks seat on UN Security Council

Israel is planning to seek a spot on the United Nations Security Council. The move, announced by Israeli Foreign Minster Silvan Shalom in a speech last week to the UN General Assembly, comes in response to the relatively warm reception Israel has received since its recent withdrawal from the Gaza Strip, a spokesperson for Israel's UN mission told JTA. The formal request could come soon.

Aid request could be reduced

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's chief of staff, Ilan Cohen, said that a request for U.S. aid to help cover the Gaza Strip withdrawal could be reduced. Negotiations for a grant of $2 billion from Congress had been put on hold while the Bush administration deals with the ravages of Hurricane Katrina. The money is needed to cover the logistics of the pullout, as well as moving former Gaza settlers to underdeveloped areas of the Negev and Galilee.

West Bank withdrawal complete

Israel completed its military withdrawal from four West Bank settlements. Military officials said last week that Sa-Nur, Homesh, Kadim and Ganim, four small settlements near Jenin, had been completely emptied. The area remains under Israeli security control, but Palestinians already have entered the former settlements. In Sa-Nur, the synagogue was dismantled and buried in a bid to prevent a repeat of the desecrations seen in former Gaza settlements earlier this month.

Terrorists killed, Qassam rockets fired

Security officers killed three wanted Islamic Jihad gunmen on Friday. One of the terrorists had masterminded the activity of several terror networks that carried out the attacks at the Stage club in Tel Aviv and Hasharon shopping centre in Netanya in which some 10 people were killed. Palestinian militants in the Gaza Strip launched on Friday three Qassam rockets at Sderot, the second attack in as many days. The rockets landed in an open field and no injuries were reported.

KLM adopts Israeli charity

KLM's AirCares board of directors decided last week to adopt the Israeli aid organization IsraAID's Save a Child's Heart as its recommended charitable program during the first quarter of 2006. KLM feels Save a Child's Heart demonstrates to the world that a child's life is more important that any political conflict. Save a Child's Heart brings medical attention to needy children around the world. Through their sponsorship, KLM AirCares will expose Save a Child's Heart activities to more than 18 million passengers.

Jordanian king keynote speaker at interfaith dialogue

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A Canadian academic originally from Toronto was one of the organizers of last week's historic interfaith dialogue meeting in Washington, D.C., in which King Abdullah II of Jordan was the keynote speaker.

In a speech titled "Judaism and Islam: Beyond Tolerance," the 43-year-old Jordanian monarch – the son of the late King Hussein – addressed more than 80 rabbis from the United States representing all streams of Judaism.

Robert Eisen, a professor of Jewish studies at George Washington University and a long-time proponent of religious dialogue, arranged the meeting together with two colleagues, Joseph Lumbard and Marc Gopin.

Lumbard, a Protestant convert to Islam, is Eisen's former student. King Abdullah, a moderate whose country has had diplomatic relations with Israel since 1994, hired Lumbard to co-ordinate an outreach program aimed at Jews and Christians. In an interview with the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, Lumbard said, "We want to get beyond the idea of a clash of civilizations to a dialogue of civilizations."

Gopin is director of the Center of World Religions, Diplomacy and Conflict Resolutions at George Mason University in Fairfax, Va.

Lumbard asked Eisen to help organize the meeting after Lumbard convinced King Abdullah to build bridges of understanding with Jews and Christians.

In his speech, King Abdullah called for dialogue and mutual forgiveness and reconciliation and lashed out at extremists.

"Jews and Muslims are tied together by culture and history," he told the rabbis. "For over a thousand years, both our peoples have contributed to the complex tapestry of Middle Eastern civilization."

But in recent years, the relationship between Jews and Muslims has been "very difficult," he added.

"Nonetheless, at this moment in history, we have no choice but to take bold strides towards mutual forgiveness and reconciliation.

Robert Eisen

In an apparent allusion to Muslim and Jewish extremists, he declared, "The only antidote is that we work together in a spirit of mutual co-operation and respect to defeat the common enemy."

Muslims and Jews, he noted, should strive not only for tolerance and coexistence, but for true acceptance.

"Our communities must see each other as sharing a common heritage and a common future. It is only by adopting this attitude that we can combat the extremist threat and live in peace with each other."

Eisen described the meeting as "a very significant step forward" in Muslim-Jewish relations.

The significance of the king's speech was threefold, he said.

"He wants to move beyond mere tolerance to real mutual acceptance. He urged Muslims and Jews to share common values and to defeat extremists. And in the name of Islamic principles, he came out explicitly against terrorism directed at Israelis and Jews."

King Abdullah II

The meeting marked the first time that King Abdullah – who ascended to the throne in 1999 after his father's death – met a Jewish group in public, according to Eisen.

"The king presented himself to the rabbis as a religious leader, and that was unprecedented," he noted.

Asked whether King Abdullah's conciliatory views are representative of Muslim opinion, Eisen replied, "He probably represents most Muslims in the world."

Eisen said the king's speech was all the more remarkable because Islamic fundamentalists in Jordan are fairly strong, anti-Semitic feelings run high and two-thirds of its population consists of embittered Palestinian refugees and their descendants.

When the meeting ended, King Abdullah approached Eisen and asked what additional steps can be taken to further dialogue.

"I don't know what will happen next, but he's interested in building bridges, and Jews should take him seriously," said Eisen, a graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto and Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) who left Toronto in 1979 to study history at Yale University and Jewish philosophy at Brandeis University.

Describing himself as a realist who does not have stars in his eyes, Eisen said that interfaith dialogue is not necessarily the answer to the deep-seated problems that ail the Middle East.

"But steps can be taken," he said. "It's important for Jews to extend the hand of friendship to the other side. King Abdullah is a potential partner."

Israeli hailed as Katrina hero

By YUVAL BEN-AMI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

HOUSTON — Raphael Izraelov, a 28-year-old Israeli, is being hailed as a hero for his work with victims of Hurricane Katrina.

The Red Cross has put Izraelov in charge of Hurricane Katrina survivors with "special needs" – hundreds of people with various kinds of disabilities and mental illnesses, and solitary elderly people.

Izraelov never imagined when he took a first-aid course in the Israel Defence Forces – the only training he has in this area – that he would receive such a responsibility.

But Karen Dewitt, another volunteer, describes Izraelov as a local hero. "I feel he brought his experience from the Israeli army here," she said.

The convention centre in Austin, home to thousands of Katrina refugees in recent weeks, was evacuated Friday and local government opened two other shelters for the newcomers from the coastal towns of Texas.

Izraelov was born in Jerusalem. His father was a known criminal who alternately disappeared and reappeared in his family's life. When Izraelov was in the army, he went looking for his father and found him several months later, in a morgue in Eilat. His father had died from a drug overdose after living in Eilat as a vagrant.

After his military service, Izraelov managed a construction company and worked on projects in the United States. At the end of the 1990s, his mother became ill with cancer, and he returned to Israel to take care of her until she recovered.

Then he went to the Far East, where he met a Texan named Sarah Mugab, who volunteered in slum and prostitution regions in Thailand. The love affair was cut short when Izraelov learned his mother was sick again. He returned to Israel and stayed with her until her death.

In 2003, Izraelov joined Mugab in Mali, Africa, where she was a volunteer with the U.S. Peace Corps. Izraelov and Mugab later travelled to Austin and were married.

When they heard of the destruction in New Orleans, Mugab was on a visit to the West Coast. Izraelov, who wanted to help, was advised to go to Houston, where the first refugees were taken.

Izraelov said nothing prepared him for Houston. "I took babies out of buses that just arrived from New Orleans, from the bridges or the Superdome. They could not wait for the selection and registration – we ran with them straight to the doctors."

Three days later, they heard that about 5,000 of the refugees were being transferred to Austin, and Izraelov followed them to continue his volunteer work.

Confronting our ultimate potential

By SHELLEY MILLMAN HERMAN

The shrill sound of the Shofar blasts, like an ancient cry that reaches deep into my soul, urging me to hear, to think, to feel, to hope, to question, to strive… It calls out to me, asking me to WAKE UP.

The shofar sound is the Jewish "wake up call" for clarity. Without the use of words, it reminds us of our own yearning to lead meaningful, productive, purposeful lives.

We hear three different sounds, each of which is meant to evoke a different idea and feeling. The tekiah, which is the long note, calls us from our day-to-day work routines, crying out for us to refocus our energies on who it is we truly want to be. The truah, the short softer note, provides comfort, allowing us to be responsive and to integrate the thoughts and feelings of these auspicious High Holy Days. The shvarim, the medium note, evokes an anxious yearning to somehow start again – this time accomplishing what we know in our hearts to be truly important in life.

The commandment on Rosh Hashanah is to "hear" the sound of the shofar (at least nine blasts). To "hear," in Judaism, means to understand.

I close my eyes, and hold my face in my precious prayer book to separate me from my surroundings, allowing me to focus inward. I "hear" the distinctive notes that send shivers throughout my body, penetrating the crusty shell that normally "shields" my soul from true understanding. Tears form at the corners of my eyes, and when I look around me afterward, I notice that others, who are aware of the shofar's lofty purpose, are also crying tears of sadness, tears of longing and tears of hopeful, new beginnings.

On Rosh Hashanah, we neither focus on our past mistakes, nor ponder our future. Instead, we confront our ultimate potential.

In life, we create our own personal universes. The question, however, is whether the universe we create will be a true reflection of the potential we possess. Rosh Hashanah is the time of judgment. Yet never once during our prayers on Rosh Hashanah, do we mention our past or ask for forgiveness! For this, we wait until Yom Kippur. How, therefore, can we be judged, if we don't deal with our past deeds?

The answer lies in the fact that, if we are not wholeheartedly committed to recognizing and working toward achieving our potential, we will be inevitably doomed to repeat our past mistakes and thereby push ourselves further away from our loftiest capabilities. So first we determine where our true potential lies, and commit to it, which is a key goal of Rosh Hashanah. Then, and only then, on Yom Kippur, can we properly recognize our mistakes, and regret them, let go of them, apologize for them and resolve to not do them again. That is the four-step process of tshuvah, which we undertake on Yom Kippur.

Now is the time to focus on all that we can be. Each of us has a unique potential. Let's keep this in mind when we are in synagogue praying on Rosh Hashanah, recognizing the Almighty's kingship and His closeness to us at this important time of year. And let's "hear" and "understand" the muffled cry of the shofar, internalize it and allow it to penetrate the deepest levels of our soul's yearnings. This year is the year that we will make a difference. This year is that year that we will "come home"!

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Franz Kafka, according to the German writer W.G. Sebald, has had more written about him than any other author. The bulk of these thousands of books and articles, Sebald adds, obscure the author's character and the quality of his work. Part of the failure of Kafka studies is an unwillingness or inability to address the role of Jewishness in Kafka's life and art. Kathi Diamant's highly readable Kafka's Last Love: The Mystery of Dora Diamant contributes to the reversal of this trend.

Norman Ravvin

Dora Diamant – who was known in some circles as "Kafka's wife" – was born in 1898 near Lodz, into a traditional Jewish family. She was a Zionist with inclinations toward social activism, as well as to a career on the stage. She met Kafka in the summer of 1923 when he was already struggling with tuberculosis. Kafka was visiting his sister's family at a German resort on the Baltic Sea, near to where Dora was working at a summer camp run by a Berlin Jewish organization. Each became an avenue for the other's need to escape difficult circumstances.

For Kafka, Dora proved to be a personality strong enough to convince him to leave his confining surroundings in Prague. And Dora's uncommon devotion to Kafka helped her overcome divided allegiances to the Berlin stage, to Jewish political activism and to the values of her abandoned Polish birthplace.

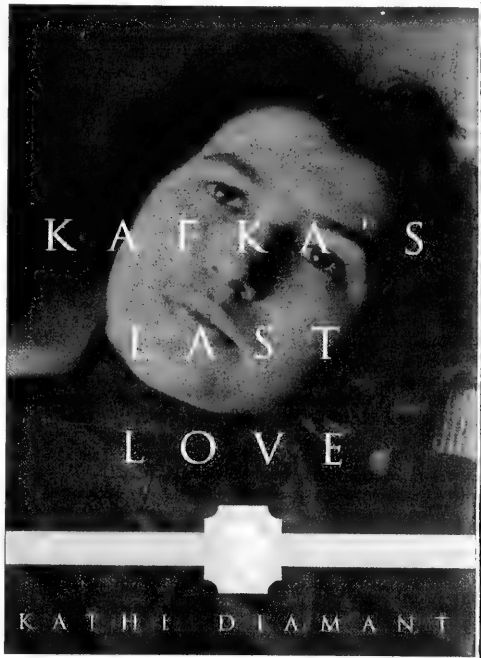
Kafka and Dora lived together at three different suburban Berlin addresses in late 1923 and early '24. At this time, the life of foreign Jews in Berlin was complicated, not so much by the rise of anti-Semitism, as by the rampant inflation that caused rent and the cost of a loaf of bread to skyrocket overnight.

Still, the months Kafka and Dora spent together had an idyllic quality. In a letter to a former lover, Kafka wrote that he had "never yet had such a beautiful apartment." He wrote fiction diligently, in the late afternoon and evenings, asking Dora to stay in the room as he worked. And he became more willing to allow his work to be published. Among the last writing business he attended to was a contract with a publisher to bring out a collection of stories called A Hunger Artist.

Together, Dora and Kafka attended classes at the Academy for Hebrew Studies in the Jewish district of Berlin. Kafka described the academy in a letter to a friend: "A whole building of handsome lecture rooms, large library, peace, well heated, few students, and everything free of charge… a fine place."

Setting aside Kafka's haunting illness and the unsettled German economic situation, one gets the impression from Diamant's book of Kafka as a highly strung but happy dweller amidst Berlin's distractions. Dora was not the only avenue by which Kafka approached his Jewishness, but it is clear that through her he was able to explore his identity in a way that had been impossible in Prague.

With Dora, he imagined immigrating to Palestine. There, according to one of their fanciful scenarios, they would open a restaurant where Dora would cook and Kafka would wait tables. "That way," Dora explained, "he could stand in the midst of everyday life, seeing everything without being seen."



All such scenarios were cancelled by Kafka's death in a sanatorium south of Vienna, in June 1924. Dora stayed with him until the end, and then, for a short time, she lived with his parents in Prague. One "morning in August she packed her suitcase and boarded the train for Germany, without saying goodbye to anyone."

Dora lived another 28 years. She married, had a daughter and became involved in Yiddishist circles in London. But her months with Kafka fell into a kind of shadow existence, spoken about among Kafka aficionados, without much being made of what Dora could tell about her time with a man whose personality was quickly obscured by myth and caricature.

A writer named Mendel Mann published a piece in Yiddish called Franz Kafka's Wife. And Melech Ravitch, who spent much of his writing life in Montreal, described an encounter with Dora in 1950s London. "I am Dora Diamant," she said to him in a Whitechapel meeting hall, surrounded by local Yiddishists. "Franz Kafka's wife – do you remember?"

Since Kafka and Dora never married, there is something deeply strange about this declaration. It heightens her role, or formalizes it, as if she, like the Kafka scholars, chose to remake the man in a way that suited her needs. For the most part, however, Kafka's Last Love depicts Dora with sympathy and tenderness, presenting her as a forgotten key to our sense of who Kafka was.

The man who appears as Dora's companion is no poster-boy for modern angst, nor is he a prophet with inklings of the totalitarian nightmare that would descend on Europe. Rather, he is revered as a lover of literature, as a man who could be as playful as a child, and who, when making tea for a guest, did so with such "final thoroughness… that he didn't manage to put the tea on the table."

Director's inspiration came from a chance encounter

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A chance encounter with an Ethiopian Jew at the 1999 Los Angeles Jewish Film Festival set into motion a train of events that culminated in director Radu Mihaileanu's latest work, Va, Vis Et Deviens (Live and Become).

Screened at the 30th Toronto International Film Festival, and scheduled to open in Israel next month, this absorbing, epic-like 140-minute movie revolves around an Ethiopian Christian boy who reinvents himself as a Jew in Israel after being adopted by a Sephardi Jewish family.

Mihaileanu, who was here earlier this month to publicize his newest feature film, knew that Ethiopian Jews had been immigrating to Israel in fairly substantial numbers. Indeed, he had heard about Operation Moses, during which thousands of Ethiopian had been airlifted to Israel.

But until he met that Ethiopian Jew in Los Angeles six years ago, with whom he has since lost contact, Mihaileanu possessed only the sketchiest of details about the mass movement of Ethiopians to Israel.

What he learned from this man was that his family endured unimaginable hardship in the arduous trek from Ethiopia to a refugee camp in Sudan.

"I had an incredible conversation with him," he recalled in an interview at a downtown hotel. "I cried as I listened."

Mihaileanu, a Romanian Jew who has lived in Paris since 1980 and describes himself as "deeply Jewish," decided there and then that his next film would draw heavily on his tale of starvation, deprivation, death and endurance.

"I went back to Paris to read everything I could about Ethiopian Jews," said Mihaileanu, whose previous film, Train of Life, turned on an amazing incident during the Holocaust.

Having immersed himself in the minutiae of Ethiopian Jewish history, he travelled to Israel, where he met Ethiopian Jews and Israeli officials – from Mossad agents to Jewish Agency functionaries – who had worked with them.

At the end of this exhausting process, Mihaileanu, who heads up Oi Oi Oi Productions in Paris, was ready to roll.

Shlomo, the central character in the film, represents the destiny of Ethiopian Jews, he explained.

In Va, Vis Et Deviens, which unfolds in several languages, notably Amharic, Hebrew and French, Shlomo gradually adapts himself to Israel, studies medicine, serves in the army and marries an Israeli.

Asked why he chose a Christian instead of a Jew as his main protagonist, Mihaileanu said he wanted to universalize the story of the Ethiopian Jews, who were isolated from mainstream Judaism for centuries.

And through Shlomo's persona, the question of Jewish identity could also be addressed, he added.

The film, which is set in Ethiopia, Sudan, Israel and France, was largely filmed on location in all but two of these countries. "I wanted to shoot in Ethiopia, but the government refused."

As a result, Mihaileanu used the Negev desert as a substitute for Ethiopia and the barren wastes of Sudan.

When he finished making Va, Vis Et Deviens, he showed it privately to Ethiopia's ambassador to France. "He liked it and wants me to arrange a screening in Addis Ababa," said Mihaileanu.

In casting the film, he chose Ethiopian Jewish actors, all of whom, with one major exception, are amateur thespians.

The only professional actor, Meskie Shibru Kebede, plays Shlomo's mother. She is associated with the Habimah Theatre in Tel Aviv.

Mihaileanu, 47, was born in Bucharest, the capital of Romania. His father, whose original name was Mordechai Buchman, is from Moldova. His mother comes from a devout Romanian Jewish family.

During the war, Mihaileanu's father was almost killed in a pogrom, and his mother's brother was murdered by Romanian fascists in 1941.

Dream comes true for Israel's Moran Choir founder

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Nomi Faran

In 1985, Nomi Faran dreamed of having her new children's choir perform outside of the Holy Land, but people didn't take her seriously.

"I remember meeting the children's parents, and telling them that my vision is for the choir to perform in international festivals after three years," says Faran on the phone from her Beit Yitzchak home.

"They told me no, they thought it was craziness."

Sure enough, after three years her still green choir travelled to Germany for their first international performance.

As strong a vision as Faran had back then, she couldn't have anticipated how successful the Moran Choir would become.

Twenty years later, she runs several choirs – one for children 4 to 7, another for kids 7 to 11, a third for 11 to 18-year-olds and finally, the Moran Ensemble Choir, ages 18 to 30, who are performing in Toronto on October 8 at U of T's Walter Hall, for the International Bach festival.

It would make sense for these groups, which consist of 200 singers in total, to practice in a major city like Tel Aviv, but instead, performers have to hone their skills at Faran's small Beit Yitzchak village.

"It's become a little like a vocal centre," says Faran. "I decide to start this choir in my village, and after it started people wanted it to stay here and not move to Tel Aviv.

"It was hard though. There wasn't a lot of money, but I feel so good that it stayed in Beit Yitzchak."

Her hard work in Beit Yitzchak has paid off. Her Moran Ensemble Choir has played all over the world including Slovenia, Germany, Hong Kong, China, Taiwan, and in Norway where the choir performed with Palestinian children in 1994.

Faran's reasons for playing all these global locales aren't to show off her vision, but to bring an Israeli experience to the rest of the world.

"I want people to feel special and good and experience how we bring music in a special and original way. Even if my singers are singing in Hebrew [to people who don't understand the language], they can show the meaning."

Fortunately for Faran, the situation in Israel hasn't hindered her choir's success.

"Only, in the last few years I sense that [fewer] countries [have invited us to sing] but other than that I've never had a feeling of something bad. We feel so good everywhere."

One reason why Faran has received such a warm welcome is that her choir doesn't shy away from singing in languages relevant to the country they're in. From a young age her students learn to sing in German, English, Italian and several other languages.

"Singing in German is very hard for people who sing in Hebrew. But because I feel that music is universal, my singers from a very young age start to sing in all languages. From Italian and French and Spanish and Japanese and Chinese. Whatever I let them do they will do.

Faran's other dream, she says, "is to start a choir with singers from Syria and Iraq – a group of Arabic and Israeli singers.

"We couldn't do it in Israel, but maybe somewhere else. Singing is the easiest way to create a bridge between people. Singing brings people to a world of tolerance and deep meaning."

Canadian tourism to Israel keeps increasing

Canadian tourists continue to put Israel on the top of their list for vacation destinations, with 5,890 Canadians visiting the country in July 2005.

According to the Central Bureau of Statistics and Israel's Ministry of Tourism, that brings the number up to 29,235 Canadian tourists in the first half of 2005 alone, up 18 per cent from the same period the previous year.

"We continue to see traveler confidence on the rise. The numbers prove it, and we are optimistic that this increase will continue," says Dani Shahal, director of Canada's Israel Government Tourist Office.

In total, more than one million tourists from around the world visited Israel between January and June 2005, up 29 per cent from the previous year.

Knoxville, Tennessee – the South at its best

By LOU LACHTER
Special to The CJN

KNOXVILLE, Tenn. — "For the best Reuben sandwich anywhere south of New York City, go to Harold's kosher-style deli," a shopkeeper in Knoxville told me recently.

I also learned that Harold's is where the movers and shakers – Jews and non-Jews – meet for a sandwich, and to close big deals in the bustling downtown area.

There are fewer than 2,000 Jews living in Knoxville, but Bernie Rosenblatt, executive director of the Knoxville Jewish Alliance, says, "We make up in dedication and commitment to Jewish values what we lack in big numbers."

Rosenblatt, one of the warmest and most enthusiastic federation directors I have ever met, could have been a prize-winning salesman. His sales pitch for the Jewish community convinced me that the Jews in Knoxville are the greatest people, pound for pound, in the world.

The Jewish Alliance (www.JewishKnoxville.org) is the result of a merger five years ago between the Knoxville Federation and the Jewish community centre. Located on 13 acres of beautiful land, the alliance has great outdoor sports facilities, a wonderful summer camp, a huge series of cultural programs (local and Israel-related), a newspaper and a senior-adult department.

Rosenblatt is working with his counterparts in Memphis and Nashville to host the national federation's 2007 General Assembly in Nashville.

There are two lovely synagogues in Knoxville – the Reform congregation, Temple Beth El, and the Conservative shul, Heska Amuna. Both are located on Kingston Pike.

Knoxville Jewry dates back to Civil War times, and Heska Amuna was founded in 1890. The synagogue celebrated its 100th anniversary in 1990, and moved to its present site in 1960.

Other Jewish organizations in Knoxville include chapters of B'nai Brith, Young Judea and Hadassah.

Named after Henry Knox, secretary of war under George Washington, the city has a population of 170,000; the metropolitan area has more than 340,000 people. The University of Tennessee has a huge, sprawling campus in Knoxville, and the Tennessee Valley Authority has its massive headquarters downtown.

Things to do and see…

Another "old" site that first opened in 1928 is the fabulous, newly transformed Tennessee Theater. The old movie palace has been given a multi-million-dollar facelift and is now an outstanding entertainment and performance- arts facility. The official opening was in January 2005. You have to see it to believe it. The theatre reminded me of the Radio City Music Hall in New York.

If you like art, be sure to visit the Emporium Center for Arts and Culture. Admission is free to see 20 different artists at work in their studios. Be sure to see Bobbie Crews' fine portraits, murals and sculptures. Galleries in the restored 1895 Emporium building exhibit a wide range of work. Other art galleries are located on Gay Street and Market Square.

Take the free trolley to get around town, and be sure to stop at the East Tennessee History Museum. If you want to experience the Tennessee River, sign up for the 1½ hour lunch cruise, complete with live music.

Plan to visit Knoxville for a few days. It is truly a southern jewel.

Torontonian David Shore, creator of the TV show House and a former producer and writer for Global TV's Traders, won an Emmy last week for dramatic writing. In receiving the award, Shore thanked his parents "for making me happy and well-enough adjusted to enjoy this." At the same time, he acknowledged "all the other people who have come into my life, who have made me miserable and cynical and angry, because this character wouldn't be the same without them."

Shore also thanked the Fox TV network for its faith in the rookie medical drama despite the negative prognostications. "A year ago, we were getting excellent reviews that said, 'Great show – it's gonna die a horrible death on Fox.' They were wrong," he said.

Another high-profile representative from Canada's Jewish community also received an Emmy last week. Star Trek icon William Shatner won for his role as a barrister in Boston Legal.

Culled from museums and private collections across Canada, the exhibition showcases 52 radiant canvases, painted over a career that spanned 40 years.

"He leapt over the barriers of poverty, lack of formal schooling and cultural isolation to create a body of work that is personal yet universal, original yet accessible, worldly yet spiritual, frozen in time yet boiling with movement," observed art critic Joan Murray.

The award-winning film Colours of My Father: A Portrait of Sam Borenstein, by Joyce Borenstein, is to be screened continuously throughout the exhibition. University of Toronto, Oct. 6 through Nov. 3.

Storyteller offers insights into his unique profession

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

In the old days, master storytellers like Chaucer and Boccaccio collected folk tales told orally for centuries and compiled them – with their own spin – into book form.

Nowadays, storytellers like Toronto's Dan Yashinsky find themselves doing the opposite: going to libraries to research the best written folk tales and adapting them for oral telling.

In Suddenly They Heard Footsteps: Storytelling for the Twenty-First Century, (Vintage Canada), Dan Yashinsky describes his unique profession as a story-teller in rich, often humorous detail. And in doing so, he quite often breaks out in what he does best – telling stories.

I found it quite humorous to see his various descriptions of storytelling techniques digress into one anecdote after another. Even when writing exposition, it seems, he can't help lapsing into telling you a story.

The book is replete with stories, with some anecdotes dating back to when he was a camp counsellor and to when his newborn son was in serious condition in hospital.

Writing a book about an oral art form might be a contradiction, but Yashinsky's easy-flowing casual narration is very conversational.

Oral storytelling, Yashinsky says, is an art form that has never died out. Whether at the water cooler, or in the schoolyard, people are always talking to each other.

The great thing about folk tales is they're universal. Whether they're Jewish, Russian, native Canadian or African, any folk tale can be adapted for its audience. Plus, although originally told hundreds of years ago to people hundreds of miles away, their moral applications still hold true today.

For instance, when he was UNICEF Canada's first storyteller-in-residence in 2002, he told traditional fables and riddles to encourage children to share with others less fortunate. The fables may be Indian or African, but the children were still able to understand the themes.

This universality is obvious once you browse through worldwide folk tales in the library. (Dewey section 398.2- folk and fairy tales.) The same pattern and characters show up in many different tales. "[The fool] Hedja Nasrudin from Turkey reappears as Juha in Morocco, one of the fools of Chelm in Poland, and as King Akbar's counsellor Birbal in India," Yashinsky says.

Although the stories are never identical – the names, places and events take on a local flavour – "enough of the pattern remains intact for you to recognize the story across the range of its various expressions."

To be a good storyteller, Yashinsky concludes, means being a good story collector. "You find [stories] in family experiences, in your neighbourhood, in the newspaper. Storytellers dowse narrative material from a wide range of wellsprings. It is a matter of walking through life with open ears, and a story-telling soul."

In Suddenly They Heard Footsteps, Yashinsky offers several insights into being a good storyteller and provides seven of his own stories for the reader to use to begin his own repertoire.

Director hopes Ethiopians will greet film positively

Compared to Poland, there was relatively little anti-Semitism in postwar Romania, he noted.

Mihaileanu earned a living as an actor in the state Yiddish theatre, but chafed at the prospect of living in a police state. And as a budding writer, he could not tolerate the usual restrictions faced by Romanian writers.

"I couldn't write what I wanted, and many of my friends were in prison," he said. "I knew I would finish in prison, and my father urged me to leave Romania. I had no future there."

On the pretext of visiting Israel, which had normal diplomatic relations with Romania, Mihaileanu left the country and flew to Israel. He then gained asylum in France, where he has resided for the past 25 years.

Eventually, he brought his brother and his parents to Paris.

His fondest hope now is that Va, Vis Et Deviens will be greeted positively by Ethiopian Jews.

"My biggest wish is not to disappoint them."

Three university students take to the road on a trip of self-discovery

By BENJI FELDMAN
Special to The CJN

For most university students April is a time where nothing exists but five courses and the importance of each exam. Mike Wagman, Laura Morris and Coby Shuman are not most students.

In April, the three added an additional goal to their plan to get straight As. They applied to Roadtrip Nation, which was started in 2001 by then-recent college graduates, Nathan Gebhard, Bran McAllister and Mike Marriner, who were on a quest to answer the greatest question for any youth: what should I do with my life?

They decided to take a roadtrip to figure it out. They bought an old 31-foot RV, painted it neon green and hit the road for three months to explore how other individuals found their roads in life.

Today, Roadtrip Nation has become a movement on campuses across the country, where students hit the road in Roadtrip Nation's green RVs to interview their own list of leaders. Their experiences are shared through an annual public television series and some publications.

For five weeks, Wagman, Morris, Shuman and a two-person camera crew moved into a 36 foot, neon green RV and drove across North America. They interviewed more than 35 people from all walks of life, including journalist Charles Krauthammer, bandleader and drummer ?uestlove of the hip hop group The Roots, Vanity Fair editor Graydon Carter, hip hop mogul Damon Dash and Amnesty International USA executive director Bill Shultz.

Their advice proved valuable, the three roadtrippers say.

Morris, 21, who graduated from McGill University with a major in psychology, explains that "before this trip I was putting a lot of pressure on myself to find one lane to success and happiness."

After the trip, she says, "I realized that putting that pressure on myself was actually counter-productive and in the end harmful, because you are not alone. The greatest service that I can do for myself is to never allow myself to be pigeonholed, to see the opportunities I have around me and take advantage of them."

Shuman, 21, a marketing major in the John Molson School of Business at Concordia University, says that "before the trip, I was always brainstorming to try and find a big idea and make a business out of it, but looking for ideas made me realize that I had a very narrow future in that respect."

After this trip, Shuman is looking at things differently. "I'm not worried about the next five years. I'm confident that wherever I'll be, I'll be happy and successful. As long as I find my passion."

Wagman, 22, who graduated from McGill with a major in humanistic studies, says that although none of the three had any journalistic experience, they believe their passion and authenticity made them good interviewers.

"Because we were living and believing the questions we were asking…," he says, "it showed that we cared, that it was personal."

Wagman says the chemistry between the three proved beneficial on the road and during interviews. Wagman and Morris have been dating for almost two years, and Wagman has been roommates with Shuman for the past three. And because the three students come from different areas of academic study, they bring a variety of perspectives and reflections to fuel the constant analysis of the paths of life that were presented to them on a daily basis.

Life on the road is often exhausting. The RV the three called Norm did not have an air conditioner, and while it provided a means to travel across the country, it offered little comfort in the heat of summer in the U.S. Midwest. Often with little sleep and rarely clean, the three dressed in what seemed to be the cleanest of their clothes and entered the offices of many prestigious people.

Wagman reflects on a "peak moment in New York where we showered with a mechanic's hose on Perry Street in the meat-packing district at 9:30 in the morning. All the swanky New Yorkers were walking to work while we stood there in our trunks hosing each other off. Later that day and only a few blocks away, we were interviewing the world's big shots. Going through that daily journey was a really cool feeling."

The trip was also mentally exhausting. Shuman claims that "you always had to be on your game," and Wagman notes that because the group had committed to being honest and sincere, the 35 interviews proved challenging.

"We spoke with 35 people who had conflicting ideas about the world and conflicting messages," Wagman says. "Trying to give them all a fair chance was hard. A lot were really compelling and a lot clashed with my life and my values, so it was hard to really think about those things. It was mentally tiring to give them all a fair shot."

The interviews are to be used in a 12-part documentary on PBS, that will air during the summer of 2006.

Kolot helps bridge cultural gaps in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Moti Bar-On

As Israel prepared to evacuate Gaza, concerns arose that the withdrawal might fracture Israeli society, perhaps even lead to civil war.

The mid-August pullout, however, unfolded smoothly, with little of the violence that was widely feared except for some provocative demonstrations by youths bused in from the West Bank.

Kolot, an Israeli NGO that promotes better understanding between Jews, can lay some modest claim to helping ensure the withdrawal was peaceful.

Kolot was founded in 1997 shortly after the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. Members worked for months in advance of the pullout to find common ground between the evacuees and the evacuators. It focused on both sides' common ethical Jewish heritage to ensure the withdrawal would not descend into chaos and violence.

Moti Bar-On, Kolot's founder and director, who was in Toronto recently as part of a 12-day North American fundraising mission, said Kolot's mostly secular students began in May to "reach out to settlers, to study the values within Torah and the value of land versus social justice."

Driving into Gaza every Tuesday for almost four months, the students helped "totally change the stereotypes of settlers as radical zealots," Bar-On stated. Instead, they saw them as human, ordinary people who had created a beautiful area for themselves in Gaza. Settlers, for their part, met non-Orthodox Jews who cared about Judaism but who disagreed with their political views.

In addition to maintaining contact with settlers, Kolot had been contracted by the Israel Defence Force (IDF) "to create person-to-person dialogues between those leaving and the IDF, to create human perspectives in this harsh action," Bar-On said.

The results were seen during the pullout. Gaza residents and soldiers created "joint Jewish rituals" to help settlers get through the trauma of leaving their homes, which they believed were part of God-given Israel. They met in synagogues, danced together, sang Hatikvah and prayed together as settlers prepared to board the buses that removed them from Gaza, Bar-On said.

That new Jewish rituals were developed in nine settlements, attracted little in the way of media attention. Nevertheless, "it is one of the highlights of modern Israel," he said.

Bar-On acknowledged he is mightily concerned about modern Israel. The assassination of Rabin by an extreme right wing zealot shocked the nation. In the aftermath of the shooting, Bar-On was appointed by the ministry of education to open a dialogue between Orthodox and secular Jewish high schools.

Early in his mandate, he met with Ron Huldai, then principal of Herzliya Gymnasium, the first high school in Israel and considered "the Ivy League high school in Tel Aviv."

When he suggested the school's students should meet pupils from an Orthodox school, Huldai, who is now mayor of Tel Aviv, told him, "'Yes, it's important that our students meet the Jewish students.'"

When Bar-On asked what he meant, the principal replied, "'We're the Israelis, they're the Jews.'"

That kind of language reminds Bar-On, who finds his inspiration in the Bible, of the ancient division between the kingdoms of Judea and Israel that followed the death of King Solomon.

That sort of division would spell a disaster for the modern state of Israel, he said.

Instead, Kolot aims to create a "dialogue between 'Jerusalem' and 'Tel Aviv'." That, he said, "is the core of my vision."

By finding common ground between the two sides, he hopes secular Israelis will recapture their Jewish heritage and begin to appreciate traditional texts. He's not expecting secular Israelis to become pious Jews, but "I believe the secular can relate to God in its own way."

At the same time, he expects Orthodox Jews to acknowledge they must compromise with the secular segment of society – for example, in the public celebration of Shabbat.

Instead of attempting to close down Israeli society completely, and creating resentment among secular Jews, a compromise might see only retail and shopping centres shut down while cultural activities remain open, including buses running to the beach, he said.

Bar-On said Kolot's raison d'etre from its inception has been to bridge the divide between secularists and religious Jews and to "try to find solutions and create a pluralistic state with Torah as the centre of our [values] and consciousness."

To further its goals, Kolot has focused on developing leaders who "can speak the language of Judaism and tikkun olam (mending the world)." Currently 240 students, ranging in age from 30 to 50, "movers and shakers" from the business world, politics and the media, are participating in a two-year study program to give them the tools they need to blend together the two worlds, Bar-On said.

They study a dozen Jewish themes, including the Tanach, Jewish life and modern Israeli poetry, while focusing on the moral obligations of being a majority culture that must relate to minorities, among them Arabs and foreign workers.

Kolot, which is based in offices in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and Ben Shemen (near Lod), also operates a study program for 20 IDF officers above the rank of colonel. They meet with Orthodox interlocutors every two weeks for three hours and for three weekends a year to discuss the traditional Jewish view of power.

King David often comes up in these talks, as he embodies important issues like authority, sin, repentance and forgiveness, Bar-On said.

Kolot also sponsors a Beit Midrash (study centre) involving 20 students who meet weekly. This year's topic is the role of family in the post modern era. Kolot has also expanded to the Internet, offering a "virtual beit midrash" and a lecture series on the Web.

Kolot's budget stands at $1.8 million (US) raised by contributions from supporters in Israel and abroad.

Past and present NFL pros involved in big moves

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — There have been several noteworthy developments this year when it comes to Jews in pro football.

On Aug. 7, Benny Friedman was enshrined in the Pro Football Hall of Fame in Canton, Ohio.

Friedman, who died at age 77 in November 1982, was a star quarterback in the 1920s and '30s who was credited with popularizing the forward pass. The two-time All-American as a collegian at the University of Michigan played pro ball for the now-defunct Cleveland Bulldogs, Detroit Wolverines, and Brooklyn Dodgers, plus the New York Giants. In 1928, he led the NFL in both rushing and passing touchdowns.

At Brandeis University, where he was inducted into the inaugural class of the Brandeis Athletic Hall of Fame in 1993, Friedman served as football coach and athletic director from 1950 until the program was disbanded after the 1959 season.

Another notable happening this year was the purchase of the Minnesota Vikings by Zygmunt Wilf, 55, believed to be the first Orthodox Jewish owner of a major sports team. Wilf is an attorney and real estate developer from New Jersey who is a leading philanthropist and proponent of Jewish causes worldwide.

Also of significance was that signal caller Jay Fiedler, a 10-year-veteran, was released by the Miami Dolphins and signed by the New York Jets.

The 33-year-old Oceanside, N.Y. native, who starred at Dartmouth University for three years in the early 1990s, was signed by the Jets as a backup to Chad Pennington. The 6-2, 225-lb. Fiedler has passed for more career yards than any other former Ivy League quarterback in NFL history, other than legendary Jewish star Sid Luckman. The Jets signed Fiedler primarily as insurance for Pennington, who is recovering from off-season shoulder surgery.

Fiedler's best years are, of course, behind him but the former Eagle, Viking, and Jaguar is still highly respected as an NFL quarterback and was described by one maven as being "quietly efficient, and a chess master of football."

Fiedler's career record as a starter versus his new team, the Jets, is 3-6. Against the rest of the league he's 34-17. So maybe his idea was if you can't beat 'em you join em.

Jay Fiedler

Left behind in Miami is Sage Rosenfels, 27, a former backup to Fiedler from Iowa State. The former Washington Redskin, whose dad is Jewish, has been in the pros for five years and has yet to earn employment as a starter. Rosenfels has size on his side at 6-4 and 220 pounds, but he's described as lacking mobility and having a sometimes inaccurate arm.

Centre and offensive guard Lennie Friedman, 28, from Duke University, stands 6-3 and tips the scales at 285 pounds. Friedman is starting his third year as a Washington Redskin after spending four years with the Denver Broncos. The Livingston, N.J., native, who has a degree in psychology, earned three letters in football, two in basketball and three in track and field at Duke.

Minnesota boasts two huge Jewish linemen who both stand 6-7 and weigh more than 300 pounds – Mike Rosenthal, 28, an offensive right tackle out of Notre Dame and Adam Goldberg, 25, an offensive left guard who is a Wyoming grad. They are listed as starters on a very good Vikings squad.

Last year, Rosenthal's season ended in early September after only two games when he broke his right foot in a loss to Philadelphia. Goldberg, after being on the team's practice squad two years ago, played in 13 contests last season.

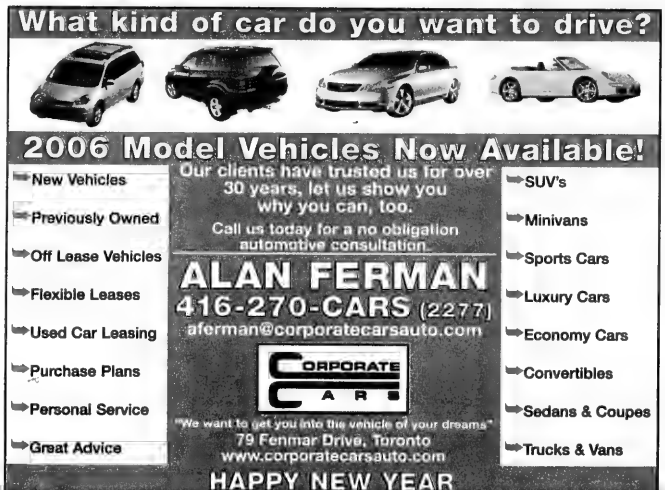
Mike Seidman, 24, is back for his third season at tight end with the Carolina Panthers. The 6-4, 260-pounder out of UCLA played in all 16 of his team's games last season. He is described as smart with good hands, but is said to lack speed and must improve his footwork as a blocker to see more time. The sociology major was a USA Today first-team All-American in college.

Punter Josh Miller, 35, who graduated from Arizona with a degree in communications, spent eight years with the Steelers in Pittsburgh. The left-footed kicker also played two seasons in the Canadian Football League with the now-defunct Baltimore Stallions, where he was twice an all-star. Miller is now in his second season with the New England Patriots, where he enjoyed his initial campaign as a Super Bowl winner. The 6-4, 225-lb. kicker was instrumental in the title win, with his strong leg and great directional-kicking skills.

San Diego Chargers' defensive end Igor Olshansky, 6-6, 309 lbs., started all 16 of his team's games last season in his rookie year. The 23-year-old Oregon State grad, who was drafted in the second round (35th overall), is a Jewish immigrant who came to North America from Ukraine with his family at age seven. He was described by one pro weekly "as not much of a factor in the pass rush, but his impressive strength and leverage helped him stalemate offensive linemen and free up the team's linebackers to flow to the ball." No surprise there, since he bench pressed a team record 505 pounds while at Oregon.

Two Jewish players are playing in the CFL this season. One is the Toronto Argonauts' Ottawa-born lineman Noah Cantor, 6-4, 270 lbs., now in his 13th pro season. The 34-year-old boasts four Grey Cup rings, three with Toronto and one with the B.C. Lions.

The other, a late August acquisition by the Edmonton Eskimos, is kicker-punter Hayden Epstein. The 6-2, 205-lb. San Diego native was drafted out of Michigan by Jacksonville of the NFL in 2002, then claimed on waivers by the Vikings, who later released him. Last year, he tried out with Denver and ended up playing in NFL Europe.



Minister tells player that Jews go to hell

JTA

WASHINGTON — The Washington Nationals have suspended the credentials of a minister who counselled players that Jews are going to hell.

Jon Moeller, a representative of Baseball Chapel, has been temporarily denied access to team facilities, and the team is asking Moeller and Baseball Chapel to disassociate themselves from the comments.

Baseball Chapel is an international ministry recognized by Major and Minor League Baseball and is responsible for the appointment and oversight of all team chapel leaders.

According to a report in the Washington Post, outfielder Ryan Church was told by a minister that his Jewish former girlfriend was going to hell.

Rabbi Shmuel Herzfeld met with Nationals President Tony Tavares after the Post report.

"What happened in the locker room was hatred," said Herzfeld, rabbi at the National Synagogue. "Everyone's allowed to believe what they want, but the moment that hatred comes into the locker room, it's a source of divisiveness."

In a statement, Church said he hopes the comments attributed to him – that he learned from Moeller that "other religions don't know any better. It's up to us to spread the word" – did not offend anyone.

Moeller and representatives from Baseball Chapel were unavailable for comment.

Learning from some old fogeys

By SANDIE BENITAH

As my friends and I ease into our mid-20s and mingle our nights away, we inevitably find ourselves interacting with a whole new group of people: thirtysomethings.

And while I pray that my 30s take their sweet time to arrive, it's starting to feel as if the gap between the two age groups is closing fast. We find ourselves at the same hot spots around town, we work together and now we're even dating each other, but the question we're all asking ourselves is one that some of us are afraid to ask out loud: Can twentysomethings and thirtysomethings relate?

On the surface, we can be the best of friends. We twentysomethings keep them young, and they affirm our membership in the adult-only club. But once we start getting to know each other, the differences are sometimes so clear that they blind us to anything else.

I've been fortunate enough to have three wonderful older sisters in my life who have always served as a sneak-peek into what I can look forward to in the years to come. Now that we are beginning to have more in common, we've become better friends and have a fun time hanging out with each other.

But no matter how much things have changed, as soon as one of them starts talking about antiquing their furniture or their favourite meatball recipe, they lose my attention. Not that I'm not interested (OK, I'll be honest, I'm not at all interested), it's just that I can't appreciate these things the same way that my sisters can. And so, conversations end abruptly and I go back to being me and my sisters go back to their own worlds.

"Twentysomethings believe too much in a fantasy world," one thirtysomething told me recently. "We've got more experience, we're hardened and we know that fantasies are just fantasies."

Fair enough. I've always said I'm an idealist. And more importantly, I've never said I wanted to change. I believe in marrying for love, not compatibility, and I believe in doing work for love, not for a living. Sure it's naive, but let me enjoy the little bit of innocence I have left, for heaven's sake.

Yet, there's no denying that the life experience of thirtysomethings is part of what attracts us to them. These new friends come to us at a tumultuous time in our lives almost as an affirmation that everything will indeed turn out just fine.

"When you're in your teens, you think you know everything, and when you're in you're 20s, you question absolutely everything. By the time you're in your 30s, you take the answers you've found in your 20s and you begin to apply them to your life," said a wise, not-so-old-after-all, friend.

But when it comes to friendships with us, what's in it for them?

Is it that we remind thirtysomethings of a time when they also felt that the future held endless possibilities? Is it that we're a lot more fun and adventurous because we don't have the same responsibilities as they do? Or maybe that's just wishful thinking on our part and the truth is that our thirtysomething friends are feeling many of the pressures that we're facing – of not being where we thought we'd be at our age, and of not measuring up to society's and our own expectations. If that's true, then we have more in common than they'll ever have with any other generation.

When it comes to bridging the gap between generations and age groups, I guess the old cliché is true. Age is just a number, but it's a number that decides your place in line on the common path we're all on.

Some thirtysomethings lag behind their thirtysomething contemporaries on this path, and we twentysomethings will always lag behind them all, but in the end, we'll all get there, year by year, day by day.

About Life

Dear Ella,

This past year has been a very trying one for my family.

First, I was diagnosed with breast cancer, and my family and I went through quite a traumatic and emotional upheaval. I had a lumpectomy, chemo and radiation. At the moment, I am taking medication and the doctors seem to be happy with the results.

About six months later, my daughter was in a car accident with her friends. She was badly hurt, but fortunately none of her injuries are permanent.

Finally, we had a fire in our cottage. We weren't there when it happened, but we lost the cottage and everything in it.

Although we are not observant, we have always celebrated Rosh Hashanah. Yet, I'm not sure I want to have anything to do with God right now. I am having trouble with that decision, but I can't help how I feel.

Lost Faith

Dear Lost Faith

What a traumatic year you and your family had. I can certainly understand why you are questioning your beliefs.

Let me try to put your situation in a different light. First your breast cancer. The shock of finding out and living through all the procedures, pain and emotional turmoil was trying, but don't forget that you came out on top. You are now a survivor. Congratulations.

Your daughter must have suffered both physically and emotionally, as well, but again, she is a survivor.

As for the cottage, it is truly horrible that you lost everything, but it is truly wonderful that none of you were there at the time.

Just maybe God was looking out for you. Just maybe it was life that threw these curve balls your way and God was the one who blanketed you with protection.

Of course, only you can search deep inside yourself to come up with your own answers. I do think, however, that there is no better place to soul-search than in shul on Rosh Hashanah.

I would like to wish you, your family and all my readers a healthy and happy New Year. Shanah Tovah.

What if there were no Days of Awe?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

If Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur 5766 were cancelled, would it make a difference to who we are?

Last year, as I stood before a large congregation at the Danforth Jewish Centre, I spoke at length about forgiveness. Yet, I still hold grudges that grate on me like fingernails on a chalkboard.

I spoke about the meaning of extending oneself in a hearty and authentic way, especially when one is in desperate need. Yet, I have held back dozens of times from sacrificing my own resources to enhance the life of someone else.

If Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur did not exist, what difference would that make in my life? Obviously, I would spend my time in a more secular fashion, and I would not concentrate on the ideas and concepts inherent in these holy days, such as forgiveness, justice and prayer.

I would be less educated on the words of some fine Jewish sages, such as Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik, who spoke at length about our relationship with God, saying in Worship of the Heart, "Judaism believes that human thinking is only a reflex of the infinite mind and that knowledge and cognition are basically Divine possessions." This tremendous idea would have eluded me had I not researched prayer for my services.

If the High Holy Days occurred, say, every second year, would this season be much different, and, ultimately, would my year feel different or pan out in an alternative way?

Would I have grown less in 5765 if I hadn't gone through the expected process of introspection and the intensity of Kol Nidre, the Al Chet prayers and Unetaneh Tokef ("Who shall live and who shall die")? I don't know.

Once again, this year I will stand before a congregation – Congregation Habonim – and encourage those in attendance to be studious about their time in synagogue and the 10-day period between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, when God determines His decree for each of us.

I know myself. I'll research the sources that speak about the pursuit of truth through tzedakah and those that talk about understanding the holiday liturgy, which is dotted and filled with praise for God – "He is the sea and He created it, and the dry land is formed by His hands" (Psalms, 95:5). But will I fear, love and believe in the Omnipotent more? Will my faith increase so that I become a worthy servant of God who adheres to the laws set out for us to make this world better?

I don't know. I am not being self-deprecating when I say that the change I have experienced this past year, and the growth I committed myself to last year as I stood before the open Ark, was minimal – nowhere near as intense and thriving as I said it would be.

Is our community more good and courageous because of the blast of the shofar, which the Jewish scholar Rabbi Saul Lieberman called "a prayer without words?" Are our leaders, and we as a community, more courageous in our stand against one inequity after another because of the blast of the truah (the protracted Shofar note), which the great sage Rabbi Samuel Raphael Hirsch described as "a summoning to leap up and fight… everything which interposes itself between us and our God?"

If Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur was cancelled this year and we received a refund for our tickets, credit for our expensive clothing, and respite from standing endlessly to answer responsively "Amen" to the cantor's request to God to renew our contract of life for another 12 months – would our live's be any different.

Would we be as good as we could be?

The Jews of Canada

— Who we are in 2005 —

Numbers never indicative of our strength

Editorial

The photos on this cover represent a mini-sweep of recent Jewish history in Canada. They tell us a great deal about who we are.

A family newly arrived after World War II celebrates its first Pesach seder in Canada. Young Jews march at home alongside fellow Jews for causes close to their heart, and joyful Maccabians strut both their Canadian and Jewish identities to an often hostile, but always onlooking, world.

It says a great deal about the demographic state of world Jewry that Canadian Jewry is the third largest Diaspora community after the United States and France. There are some 375,000 Jews in Canada, a figure roughly equivalent to eight sell-out crowds at the Rogers Centre in Toronto.

But as with Jewish history in general, so too with Canada's Jews. Our numbers have never been indicative of our strength, fortitude, courage and resolve, or of our ability to do that which is good and just and right for all mankind.

This supplement focuses on us, the 375,000 Jews who comprise Canadian Jewry. Who are we? When and how did we arrive? Where are we headed?

The CJN asked a number of authors, all experts and scholars in their respective fields, to elaborate on some of these questions. Of course, not all of them are answered, nor could they be in these few pages.

Most of the essays, out of necessity, paint broad canvasses. Two essays however, paint portraits of specific individuals – the late chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, Bora Laskin, and the late author, poet, essayist, novelist and journalist A. M. Klein – for their lives are representative of all our possibilities. Theirs are stories that all of us should know.

All of the "painters" in this supplement are masters from whose writing skill, knowledge and erudition we will all benefit.

We also benefit from the knowing eye of Janice Rosen, the chief archivist of Canadian Jewish Congress in Montreal, who helpfully sent us a number of classic photos that are included in these pages.

We hope you will enjoy this supplement and that some of what you read will make the coming holidays even more meaningful.

Shanah tovah.

To the 'fabled city': the distinctiveness of the Canadian Jewish experience

By GERALD TULCHINSKY

Canadian Jewish history is a subject in its own right, not a branch or pale reflection of the Jewish experience in the United States.

Its contours were shaped by Canadian conditions, and did not necessarily reflect occurrences and trends that took place first among mainstream Americans and, years later, were experienced by their northern cousins. The Americanization of the Jews – their gradual or rapid adaptation to and acceptance in the mainstream of American culture, and the development of what might be called the American Jewish symbiosis – was not necessarily mirrored in Canada.

To be sure, there are many significant – almost overpowering – resemblances between the American and Canadian Jewish historical experiences, and, in certain respects, the communities are so similar as to be almost indistinguishable. Without doubt, the more numerous and more highly developed American Jewish communities exercised strong and continuing influences on Canadian Jewry.

After all, in both cases, most of their people came from eastern Europe in sudden and vast immigration waves before 1914. And, of course, the cultural baggage they brought with them was identical in both countries: deeply pious, rigid Orthodoxy in many and a complex mix of philosophies such as Marxism, socialism, anarchism, Zionism, bundism, and other ideals among many of the young who had been exposed to the intellectual transformations outside their own narrow world. The historical development of both the American and Canadian Jewish communities was also highly similar, particularly in such things as post-1900 settlement patterns, cultural life (including the use of Yiddish in newspapers, theatres and schools), and the economic struggle, especially in the clothing industry.

What should not be conceded, however, is that all of the major forces that shaped the Jewish experience in Canada were the same as, or even similar to, those in the United States. Canadian Jewry experienced a significantly different evolution as a result of the national context in which it was situated.

It is not enough to say that Canada was a different country. Despite strong American influences affecting all aspects of Canadian life, including the evolution of the Jewish community, there were different co-ordinates to the Canadian constitutional structure, political life, national composition, urban patterns and economic development that all directly affected the evolution of Jewish life in Canada. Some of the most significant factors influencing the Jewish community in this country had no counterparts in the United States and vice versa.

The duality of Canada's national personality posed particularly acute problems for that very large part of Canadian Jewry living in the province of Quebec. There the confessional school system established at Confederation put the Jewish community at a serious disadvantage, because no specific legal provision existed for Jewish children in either the Catholic or the Protestant systems. Whether these children had a right to go to school was a testy legal and political question that was resolved in stages over nearly 30 years of struggle, between 1903 and 1930.

It was a battle for fundamental civil rights that were being denied them by the Protestant school commissioners of Montreal and the Quebec provincial government. Minor victories in the courts and in the legislative assembly were the result of a galvanization of the Jewish community on a massive scale, which led to the emergence of a collective consciousness noteworthy for its major spokespersons, newspaper development, intense intra-communal debate and greatly heightened awareness of the Jewish place in the legal, political and social context of the province of Quebec. Nothing like this kind of Jewish civil-rights fight occurred in the United States, because nowhere in the republic did the same kind of co-ordinates exist to bar the Jewish advance to social equality.

This crucial contest, with its ramifications through all sectors of life in a community that included, at one point, almost half of Canada's Jews, was only one feature of Canadian Jewish history that grew out of Canada's duality. In fact, Quebec's rapidly expanding Jewish community ran directly afoul of French-Canadian nationalism at its beginnings in the early 1800s and during its efflorescence in the late 19th and the early 20th centuries. In this era such nationalism, with its blend of agriculturalism, anti-statism and messianism, where the Church regarded "the opposition forces… as the fiends of hell," combined a militant ultramontane Catholic faith – a renewed adherence to Rome and the Pope – with the national rebirth of an agricultural, French-speaking republic on the St. Lawrence.

Amongst those who believed in this visionary frame of reference, the Jew was a standing affront, a force that was believed to be fostering morals that threatened French Canada's survival. The Jew was the infidel, the Christ-killer whose continuing rejection of Christianity constituted an insult to the faith, and whose rapidly increasing presence in Montreal was seen as a dire threat to the purity of the French-Canadian ideal. The Jew came to be regarded as an economic threat as well, both as an unscrupulous exploiter in the clothing industry, in which Jewish contractors worked the piecing-out system using Jewish and French-Canadian labour in home or attic shops where 80-hour weeks were not uncommon, and as a competitor, in the market for unskilled and semi-skilled jobs. The Jew was also perceived as the political and social radical and trade union activist, the purveyor of insidious socialist and anarchist ideas that some French-Canadian clerical and lay readers saw as infectious and corrosive poisons in the pure springs of their people's religious and social life. In all, then, the Jew was included among those who constituted a threat to the destiny of the Québécois to survive and thrive as a distinctive Catholic and French agrarian polity in Quebec.

Jews were the largest minority in the province, outside the old-stock English-speaking groups, who – though separated by class and religious issues – nevertheless maintained a certain transcendent coherence and unity, and were headed by a tight, tough, wealthy and influential elite. Montreal's Jewish quarter, which by about 1900 stretched north from the docks along St. Lawrence Street to Dorchester, had mushroomed in size with the pre-1914 infusions of immigrants. By 1920, virtually the entire city section from the waterfront north, in a belt of a few blocks wide on either side of St. Lawrence-Main to the lower reaches of Outremont, constituted a huge, predominantly Jewish enclave of factories, shops, synagogues and tightly packed housing. The fact that this "Jewish quarter" was at the geographical centre of the city and divided the French from the English sections of Montreal was also symbolic of the precarious marginality of the Jewish presence to both communities.

Anti-Semitism in Quebec had long-lasting effect

Insofar as the anglophones were concerned, the Jews were not particularly welcome, as indicated by the treatment that Jewish pupils and teachers received from the Protestant board of school commissioners after 1900. The francophones, because of their closer physical proximity, far greater numbers and political prowess were able to manifest their anti-Semitism both on the street and in the political arena. However, the anti-Semitism of Montreal's Anglo-Protestants, who made Jews unwelcome in their schools and severely restricted their entry into McGill University, was much more damaging. In all, French and Anglo-Canadian anti-Semitism in Quebec was a very serious business, and it had a long-lasting effect on the political and social well-being of the large Jewish population of Quebec.

Highlighted by the Plamondon case of 1910, in which Jews were publicly accused of practising abominations allegedly stemming from the Talmud, anti-Semitism in Quebec seemed to possess a special force, a greater depth and virulence than anywhere else in North America. After 1920, this anti-Semitism welled up time and again, not only to remind Jews of their inferior position in the eyes of some French-Canadian nationalist and ultramontane clerics, but also to reduce their presence in sectors where they had achieved some prominence.

Anti-Semitism in English Canada was widespread and was given a powerful expression by Toronto's leading late-19th century intellectual, Goldwin Smith. Still, it appears that anti-Semitism outside Quebec was not nearly as strong as the anti-Oriental feelings on the Canadian West Coast, or the anti-Slavic attitudes on the Prairies. The special character, dimensions and persistence of the French-Canadian variety from the 1920s onward helped to shape the community consciousness of about half of Canada's Jews – and, indirectly, through national organizations dominated by Montreal, of a significant portion of the remainder.

If the Canadian Jewish community has been much more effectively governed in national organizations than American Jewry, this is largely attributable to the fact that Canadian Jewry has felt more threatened. A leading reason for the reactivation of the Canadian Jewish Congress in 1934 was the need to counter the increasingly virulent anti-Semitism in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada.

Need for strong national organizations was recognized

Congress sought an alliance with B'nai Brith on this issue and thus the Joint Public Relations Committee was established in 1939 with a mandate to combat domestic anti-Semitism.

Governance through national organizations like Congress, which was originally established in 1919, was also facilitated by another peculiar feature of Canadian Jewry: its overwhelming concentration in a few metropolitan centres after the 1880s. In contrast to the Jews in the United States, where by mid-century significant Jewish communities existed in all major cities up and down the eastern seaboard, in the Midwest, and on the Gulf Coast, Canada's Jews before 1900 overwhelmingly chose Montreal and Toronto. Later, Winnipeg became a third centre. The Trois-Rivières community declined, the one in Quebec City withered, that of Victoria stagnated and dwindled, and the Maritime centres had barely begun in the 19th century.

In the United States, even before the Civil War, there were about 200 congregations in existence across the country, some of them in major southern cities. In the 1870s, Cincinnati emerged as a leading centre of Jewish religious life, and Philadelphia as a notable educational and cultural hub, while Chicago attracted a huge Jewish population after the 1880s. All of these communities were independent of New York, a city one-quarter Jewish by 1914 and the residence of about half of all America's Jews.

In Canada, there were no counterparts to Cincinnati, Philadelphia, Chicago, Boston, or the other Jewish centres, which so diffused power and influence in American Jewry that national organizations have always been relatively weak. With a high concentration of Canadian Jews in two or three cities, and about half of them in one pre-eminent metropolis, countervailing influences did not develop here on anything like the scale that they did in the United States. Hence, Jewish national organizations were apparently able to establish themselves more effectively than their American counterparts.

After 1898, for example, the Federation of Canadian Zionist Societies, controlled from Montreal by the patrician Clarence de Sola, was greatly envied by the Americans because of its impressive national structure, active branches and tight organization. After its re-establishment in 1934, the Canadian Jewish Congress, which was also based in Montreal, attempted to serve as a forum for all shades of political, religious and cultural expression. As a voice for Canadian Jewry on major issues, it was far more effective than the American Jewish Congress, which suffered from the rivalry of a number of competing national organizations.

This is not to say that the Canadian Jewish community was more politically or intellectually homogeneous than the American, or always unified, or that, notwithstanding Montreal's obvious importance, there were not competing regional and other interests. The leadership of Toronto's Jewish community came to resent strongly the control of national organizations by the Montreal patricians, while in Winnipeg and elsewhere on the Prairies, an independent spirit emerged early and persisted for many years. Yet virtually all elements agreed on the need for strong national organizations. B'nai Brith and Hadassah-WIZO, for example, operated independently of Congress, contributing to the development of Canada's Jewish community through the national scope of their activities.

Certain factors help to explain this broad commonality of purpose. The most important one is the comparatively strong religious homogeneity of Canadian Jewry. This is another major point of difference between the two North American communities, and it constitutes an essential ingredient in any understanding of the contours of Canadian Jewish history.

American Jewry was shaped and, until at least 1900, was dominated by the German immigrants who arrived in the United States during the 1840s and '50s. The cultural baggage of some German Jews included fragments of the Enlightenment philosophy of Moses Mendelssohn and some of the influences of the new scientific study of Jewish culture, Wissenschaft des Judentums.

From this early 19th-century German-Jewish Reform movement, a new synagogue, theology and liturgy had emerged, in which virtually all elements of Jewish particularism were expunged and Jewish universalism was celebrated. Thus many Jews were transformed into Germans of the mosaic persuasion. Jewish religious beliefs were reinterpreted and reformulated root and branch by the rabbis of the new Judaism.

In their transposition to America, these Germans erected their Reform synagogues, established Cincinnati as their centre and virtually dominated American Jewish religious life, so that by 1880, most of the 270 synagogues in the United States were Reform. Furthermore, they now became Americans of the mosaic persuasion. Acquiring wealth, influence, power and social prestige, the Loebs, Kuhns, Gimbels, Guggenheims and others of "our crowd" began a process of merging into the American mainstream, while still others made significant contributions to American progressivism.

North of the 49th parallel, the Jewish community developed in a much different way. Canada did not receive significant numbers of German Jewish immigrants with Reform impulses to overwhelm the existing institutions and thus escaped being heavily influenced by the Reform movement and its accompanying philosophy of emancipation. Not that Canadian Jews refrained from trying to adjust economically, politically, and in every other way. But most of them had not been exposed to either the Getman-Jewish Reform synthesis or to the Enlightenment-influenced Orthodoxy of Samson Raphael Hirsch. Indeed, the most influential element culturally in Montreal until the 1880s was the "Spanish and Portuguese," while in Toronto, British and Lithuanians outnumbered all other elements.

These dominant groups in Toronto and Montreal were essentially Conservative and Orthodox in religious practice. And while certain Reform influences emerged in Toronto in the 1880s, the Montrealers remained adamantly, almost pugnaciously, Orthodox. Rev. Abraham de Sola and his son, Meldola, who held the pulpit of the Shearith Israel synagogue in succession for about 70 years, acted as stout defenders of the old faith in Montreal, and for many years successfully kept the tiny Reform group out of the mainstream of religious life in the community.

The absence of a German migration to Canada large enough to overwhelm or replace the traditional communities is thus highly significant. For while American Jewry was greatly influenced by the Reform philosophy, Canada was affected to a much lesser degree, and in Montreal a certain counter-reformation spirit prevailed. Most of Canadian Jewry remained predominantly tied to the old faith, even though some assimilation was already under way.

This outlook may also have reflected the comparatively conservative ethos of 19th-century Canada, where traditional values prevailed of Crown, established churches and certain quasi-aristocratic trappings related to the British connection. Canadian Jews like the influential de Sola family saw themselves as defenders of the British tradition as well as of Jewish Orthodoxy. Although this outlook never had the philosophical respectability of the ideal German or American Jewish symbiosis, it did establish a certain British tone or shading for the community.

In Canada, especially in Quebec, Jews knew that they were different and would remain so, equal in law perhaps but distinct, whereas in the United States there was a belief – especially among the second generation – in a large degree of integration into a culture that, because it was by definition republican, democratic and libertarian, would, theoretically, allow the Jewish admixture.

With Orthodoxy (even if it was only nominal) and tradition still firmly in place and centred in a much smaller, more concentrated group of communities, by the 1880s and '90s Canadian Jewry faced the wave of immigrants who continued to arrive until World War I. During the 1920s, many of these dissimilarities between the two North American communities began to diminish. But not entirely: in both Canada and the United States the eastern European Jews, whether traditional or radical, came increasingly into communal prominence. They thronged into the clothing factories and concentrated themselves in urban ghettos, and in Canada a small but symbolically important group moved out to settle on the Prairies. Yet previously developed national differences in the two Jewries nevertheless continued to influence the ways in which certain institutions and organizations evolved, while the timing of national economic development somewhat affected the subsequent demographic distribution of Jews. Thus differences, some subtle and some blatant, continued.

For example, Zionism has been, from the 1890s until the present, a continuous and dominant part of the Canadian Jewish identity. This is not to say that a majority of Canadian Jews have been openly Zionist, but significant segments of the old patrician and nouveau riche elites have been so. American Jewry, or at least its leadership and moneyed elite, on the other hand, for many years either held back from Zionism or actively opposed it. For many American Jews – especially those who shared the ideal of symbiosis, the goal implanted by the mid-19th-century German immigrants – Zionism was a threat, because it raised the problem of dual loyalty. The nagging question of how one could become a Zionist – that is, one who believed in the return of Jews to the ancient homeland – while still being a loyal American dedicated to the achievement of cultural integration in the United States, could not be easily answered. Even after U.S. Supreme Court Justice Louis D. Brandeis, the chair of the Provisional Executive Committee for General Zionist Affairs, developed a partially satisfying answer to this dilemma, most of the old German community – now America's Jewish elite – continued in a steadily militant anti-Zionist stance. And it is interesting to note that the Reform synagogue – the quintessential expression of the German-American Jewish quest for symbiosis – was a major vehicle for opposition to Zionism, although there were a few significant Reform leaders who actively espoused it.

At the Cincinnati seminary, rabbinical students were taught by outspoken opponents of the idea of a Jewish homeland in Palestine; consequently this message was heard from many American Reform pulpits. When one American rabbi, Maurice Eisendrath, tried to bring this anti-Zionism into his Toronto Reform congregation in the late 1920s, the community was outraged and a sizable secession from the synagogue took place, although the unrepentant rabbi continued his attack. He only ceased his opposition in the late 1930s, as did most of the rest of Reform Jewry, for one principal, terrible reason: the advent of Nazism in Germany.

The explanation of the more favourable attitude toward Zionism among Canadians brings us to another point: Jews in Canada did not understand that there were any tests of Canadian nationalism they had to meet. In Montreal, insofar as both French and English were concerned, Jews were pariahs, and barely tolerated. But the predominant strain of pre-1914 Canadian-nationalist thought, that of the imperial federationists, though expressing a narrowly British view of history, national character and Canada's mission, also indirectly implied an integration into British imperialism, a toleration, an openness, a liberality toward racial and cultural diversity, and a grudging acceptance in this polity in which freedom is said to wear a crown.

From the standpoint of social activist James S. Woodsworth's "social gospel" outlook, Jews – like Ukrainians and Chinese – were communities that could be absorbed. It may be that the origins of the idea of the Canadian mosaic lie somewhere in these attitudes, and in the fact that there appears to have been no public ethos in English Canada that necessarily overrode all other loyalties. In any event, Canada was without the intellectual influences of the German Jews, who might have been inclined to think their way into a Canadian Jewish loyalty conundrum.

In these circumstances of no competing nationalism and no opposing Reform ideology, the Zionist movement in Canada thrived. Under the leadership of Clarence de Sola, a member of the Spanish-Portuguese "aristocracy" of Montreal Jewry who headed the Canadian Zionist Federation from 1898 to 1919, the movement grew. It spread quickly through the metropolitan centres, into small communities across the country and even into the few scattered farming colonies on the Prairies. So successful was this organization that de Sola proudly held it up as a model for Zionists in other countries to follow, especially for the Americans who were grappling with a multitude of problems, the most serious being an intellectual justification of the movement's first principles. No such problems bothered de Sola.

His followers included many of the Russian, Polish and Romanian Jews who were entering the country in the early 1900s, outnumbering all previous Jewish immigration. After 1901, when the nation's Jewish population stood at well over 16,000, an average of 6,000 Jews arrived every year. By 1911, the Jewish population had reached almost 75,000, an increase of almost 370 per cent in just one decade. In 1913-14 alone, more than 18,000 Jews reached Canada. Even during World War I, an annual average of 4,000 Jews arrived. The resurgence of Jewish immigration in the 1920s brought additional, though smaller, waves from the Ukraine, Poland and Lithuania. To most of these eastern European Jews, modern political Zionism was a major vehicle of redemption from a hateful and oppressive czarist regime that was also, semi-officially, anti-Semitic. Consequently, they arrived in Canada with no predispositions toward symbiosis.

Perhaps Zionism thrived also because some Canadian Jewish leaders, including Clarence de Sola and Rabbi Ashinsky, of Montreal's Shaar Hashomayim synagogue, saw the movement as a potentially integral part of British imperialism. De Sola waxed eloquent on this theory and later claimed to have broached the idea of a British pro-Zionist declaration with London officials several months before the famous Balfour Declaration of November 1917.

The Canadian Zionist Federation became a kind of national Jewish congress because of its country-wide support – though even among both religious and secular Russian immigrants, this was not unanimous. It was followed by the Canadian Jewish Congress, a fundamentally Zionist organization, after World War 1. Zionism thus went deeper into the Canadian Jewish context than into the American one, because of the conjuncture of separate and distinctive cultural, demographic and political factors, and because of the unique constitutional and racial structure of Canada.

Perhaps Canadian Jews, in reaction to French-Canadian anti-Semitism and nationalism, may even have absorbed some nationalistic influences from the French Canadians in Montreal. In any event, Zionism's greater strength and support from Canadian Jewry was noted by the world leaders of the movement, and was expressed by higher per capita financial contributions and emigration to Palestine both before and after the proclamation of the State of Israel in 1948.

A further determining factor in Canadian Jewish history is that Canada continued to receive substantial Jewish immigration through the 1920s, while the tide to the U.S., though numerically larger, was, relatively, far less significant. The typical immigrants of 1923-24, when a major influx of Jews arrived from Romania, were probably somewhat different from their counterparts of 1914.

They had experienced first-hand the European turmoil of 1914-18, the massive upheaval of the Russian Revolution, the ensuing devastating civil war, and the terrible Ukrainian pogroms. Recent eastern European history and the modernization of Russia before 1914, as well as the resonances of the Old World (through the arrival of nearly 50,000 Jewish immigrants during the 1920s), probably had a deeper, more pervasive, and more lasting effect on the Canadian community, because of its relative size, than on the American one. Moreover, this immigration of the '20s included a small number of young intellectuals, and likely had a strong enriching influence on Jewish cultural life in Canada.

Thus the contours of Canadian Jewish history were determined by a set of co-ordinates that were unique to the northern half of this continent, and that resulted in the evolution of a community with a personality different from that of American Jewry. Canada had a different history, polity and culture, and different immigration, economic and urban-growth patterns. Not surprisingly, there evolved here a community that was more traditional, more superficially unified and more culturally homogeneous than that of our U.S. cousins.

While American Jewry yearned for integration into the mainstream of the great republic, Canadians strove to express their Jewishness in a country that had no coherent self-definition – except perhaps the solitudes of duality, isolation, northernness and borrowed glory. In the U.S., songwriter Irving Berlin wrote God Bless America; in Canada the quintessential Jewish literary figure, who is probably this country's greatest 20th-century poet – Montreal's Abraham Moses Klein – wrote poems of anguish expressing longing for redemption of the Jewish soul lost in a sea of modernity. "Go catch the echoes of the ticks of time/ Spy the interstices between its sands," he tells us in Of Remembrance. And while he was able, in his collection of poems The Rocking Chair, to capture the culture of French Canada better than any anglophone has ever done, he reiterated throughout his career (and especially in response to the Shoah) his Jewish frame of reference. Toward the end his thoughts returned to "the ghetto streets where a Jewboy dreamed pavement into pleasant Bible-land":

"It is a fabled city that I seek,
It stands in Space's vapours and Time's haze;
Thence comes my sadness in remembered joy
Constrictive of the throat;
Thence do I hear, as heard by a Jewboy,
The Hebrew violins,
Delighting in the sobbed Oriental note."

These are features that make Canadian Jewish history a separate study. To be sure, they are not entirely distinct from the American Jewish experience, as a reading of Henry Feingold's superb survey, Zion in America, demonstrates. Many similarities exist, and as Canadian history is in certain respects both strikingly different from and strongly similar to American history, the historical experience of the Jewish community of Canada is a reflection of that reality.

Gerald Tulchinsky, emeritus professor of history at Queen's University, is the author of Taking Root. The Origins of the Canadian Jewish Community (1992) and Branching Out. The Transformation of the Canadian Jewish Community (1998). This essay is adapted from his contribution to From Immigration to Integration. Canadian and U.S. Jewry: similar, yet different

By MORTON WEINFELD

A Martian landing on earth would be hard pressed to discover major differences between American and Canadian Jewry. The current realities for American and Canadian Jews are positive, and similar, when compared to other Diaspora communities. North American Jews participate in all dimensions of social life and retain a reasonably strong Jewish identity, while levels of anti-Semitism are relatively low. And yet, Canadian-American differences persist.

Jews in Canada are by any measure more Jewish than their American counterparts. But American Jews are more integrated into the social, cultural and political fabric of their country. Both phenomena are a result of the greater proportion of immigrants among Jews in Canada. There are also emerging differences in the respective host environments. The United States seems to be developing into the far more religious society, with increasing influence of the Christian right within the Republican Party. There is also an increasing divergence in foreign policy, with the United States – its government and population – more supportive of Israel, while Canada tries to hew to a more nuanced position closer to Europe, as reflected in the decision not to take part in the Iraq war.

Demographic Overview

There are about 370,000 Jews (broadly defined) living in Canada and about 5.3 million in the United States. But American Jews – who represent about 1.8 per cent of the population, compared to 1.2 per cent in Canada – have more clout.

Both Jewish communities reside in major metropolitan areas. And in both countries, Jews bring a certain cosmopolitan élan to the cities where they are most concentrated. However, American Jews are more over-represented in key cities such as New York and Los Angeles, the economic and cultural capitals of their country. Jews in Toronto and Montreal comprise at most three to four per cent of the population in those cities. Yet at the same time, Canadian Jewry has experienced less migration or expansion westward compared to the migration of American Jews out of the northeastern United States. Three quarters of Canadian Jews live in Toronto and Montreal, while only 43 per cent of American Jews live in the U.S. northeast.

The Canadian Jewish population has more immigrants, with an estimated 25 to 30 per cent of Jews being foreign born – including aging Holocaust survivors, Russian Jews, Sephardi/francophone Jews, Israelis, South Africans, Latin Americans and others – compared to 12 to 15 per cent in the United States. Canada also has proportionately fewer secular Jews, more Jews by choice and fewer "non-Jews of Jewish ethnic origin" or assimilated Jews. Ironically, there is also cross-border migration of Jews. Canadian Jews move south for economic reasons, often following or leading to marriage to an American. Some chassidic Jews have moved to Montreal as a result of marriages or in search of cheaper Jewish schooling.

Overall, the Canadian Jewish population has been growing, due to slightly higher immigration and a higher fertility rate, and lower mixed marriage rates. (Canada and Germany are the only two significant Diaspora communities that are experiencing population growth.) The American Jewish population since the 1970s has been static. Both countries are also wrestling with the problems of an aging community.

Socio-economic Status

In both countries, Jews earn, on average, incomes that are well above the national average, fuelled by above average levels of educational attainment, even as some pockets of poverty persist. In both countries, Jews are disproportionately represented in professions such as medicine, law, education, social services and accountancy. In both, Jews find themselves disproportionately linked economically to other Jews, whether in the private sector as partners, suppliers, workers or customers/clients, or as employees of the large array of Jewish communal organizations. Not only are average Jewish incomes high, Jews are now statistically over-represented among the super rich and economically powerful. Between 20 to 25 per cent of the Forbes 400 list of richest Americans are Jews, while Jews make up 15 to 20 per cent of similar Canadian lists.

Family Life and Intermarriage

Over the past decades, levels of divorce in North America in general have been rising, but there are differences among Jews in Canada and the United States. Canadian Jewish family life is more traditional and more stable. American divorce rates for Jews and non-Jews alike are higher than those in Canada. America's more liberal culture makes divorce more frequent across the board.

However, in both countries, Jews are less likely to have children out of wedlock, and fewer Jews are found in common-law and lone-parent families. Some of these gaps reflect the impact of Jewish cultural values and much higher socio-economic status for Jews.

Jewish feminism has posed challenges to organized Jewish life. There are perhaps 10 practising women rabbis in Canada, proportionally far fewer than in the United States. Bat mitzvah celebrations are growing among the non-Orthodox, and even among the Orthodox there are new ceremonies, such as delivering a dvar Torah at a kiddush. Both communities are wrestling with the role and status of gay and lesbian Jews and their organizations. Given that Canada has a more traditional Jewish community, the problems are more acute. Another strain on families in both communities is greater geographic mobility. This is accentuated as aging parents and grandparents move from Canadian cities and the American northeast to vacation or live in Florida and the American southwest.

American Jews are more likely to be involved in mixed marriages. The American rate is likely in the mid- to high 40 per cent range, while Canadian rates are in the low 30 per cent range. Still, in both countries, the taboos against mixed marriage have eroded, though Canadian attitudes remain more firmly opposed than those south of the border. In both countries, Jewish opposition to intermarriage runs counter to a growing liberal attitude that sees such marriages as reflecting tolerance and openness. American evidence finds that children in mixed marriages are most likely lost to the Jewish community. It may be that the general Canadian traditionalism increases the linkages for such children in Canada. In both countries, mixed marriage rates are higher in areas away from the traditional and older Jewish communities in the northeast.

Golda Myerson (Meir) and Labor Zionist women during a visit to Montreal in 1928. [CJC archives]

Both American and Canadian Jews live near, and socialize with, other Jews, although the levels of this concentration are slightly higher in Canada. As well, in both countries, there are sub-concentrations of groups, such as modern Orthodox and haredi Jews. Both countries also have high levels of communal development and organizational participation compared to other minority or religious groups, though the levels are slightly higher in Canada. In Canada, the high levels are sustained by the greater identification of Canadian Jews with Judaism, while in the United States, they are sustained by the peculiarly American tradition of joining and supporting all sorts of voluntary organizations (the motto "America is a nation of joiners." works well for Jews).

In both countries, Jewish giving has been marked by three major developments. First is the habit of directed giving to specific agencies or causes and away from federations and appeals. Second is the emergence of Jewish community foundations in major cities, relying on endowments. Third is the spread of Jewish family foundations, where the giving often reflects the interests of the donors. Canadian Jews give more per capita than Americans.

Steady rise in day school numbers

Jewish Culture and Religion

Jewish culture is more vigorous in Canada than in the United States, though in both, it is more vibrant than the cultures of comparable minority groups. About twice as many Canadian Jews report having read a Jewish newspaper. Both Hebrew and Yiddish are used far more in Canada than in the United States, though the klezmer revival is going on in both countries. And the United States, with its larger population, has major Jewish publications such as Commentary, Moment, the Forward, and even the countercultural Heeb. On both sides of the border, Jews are major contributors to all forms of general culture, though U.S. Jews seem more central to their culture than Canadian Jews are (this is even more accurate for Quebec). While Canadian Jews are indeed active in all cultural domains, Jewish liberal cultural creativity does not have the same weight as it does in New York or Los Angeles. In both countries, Israel and the Holocaust have emerged as important Jewish cultural themes, even though in Canada, twice as many adults have visited Israel and the proportion of Holocaust survivors is much larger.

In both countries, there has been a steady rise in enrolments in Jewish day schools over the past decades. But in general, Canadian Jews receive more Jewish education than American Jews, and more of it is of the day school variety. The greater levels of Jewish identification among Canadian Jews leads to parents opting for more Jewish education for their children. Secondly, tuition in Canada is more affordable, due partly to the fact that in some provinces – excluding Ontario – government funding and tax deductions have been available to private – including Jewish – schools. An estimated 90 per cent of Canadian Jewish children receive some form of Jewish education, and of these 78 per cent are enrolled in day schools. These figures are far higher than national figures for Christian or other ethnic education, and for Jewish education in the United States.

In the United States, 79 per cent of Jewish children ages six to 17 have received some form of Jewish education, and of that, 29 per cent is day school. The level of formal Jewish education of North American Jewish children today is on the whole much greater than the levels among their North American-born parents or grandparents, whose education consisted mainly of tutors or Sunday schools, or a few years of afternoon schools.

Jewish education highlights an important difference between Canadian and American Jews, and indeed between the two countries. American Jews, at least as represented by official organizations, have been fierce supporters of the separation of church and state, which is rooted in the American Constitution. They usually oppose public funding of private religious schooling, seeing Jewish schools as potentially ghettoizing. American Jews and Jewish organizations are staunch defenders of the American public school system, since many immigrant Jewish children made their way up the occupational ladder via public schools. Canada never developed an American mythology about the egalitarian nature of the public school system, and it does not have the same constitutional separation of church and state. Hence, provincial governments can choose to support religious private schools.

In both countries, Jewish education goes on before and after elementary and high school, and across the religious spectrum. Jewish nurseries, play groups, and day-care centres are now common in every Jewish community and cater to every Jewish denomination. A similar explosion has taken place at the post-secondary level and beyond – for instance, Haredi Jewish men are able to continue studying, even after they get married, in kollels. For more secular types, the campus has become an increasingly important venue. About 41 per cent of current American Jewish college and graduate students report having taken a Jewish studies course, and about 25 per cent of adults say they have participated in some adult Jewish education classes. Canadian rates are likely comparable.

Judaism in Canada, like much of Jewish life, is more traditional than in the United States. In Canada, Orthodoxy is stronger while Reform is weaker. Yet both countries are seeing similar changes in the various movements. Orthodoxy has been moving to the right, while Reform has been moving to both the right (in the form of increasing support for Israel and promoting intensive Jewish education) and to the left (by continuing to promote equality for women, gays and lesbians, as well as by exploring new options for involving non-Jewish spouses in synagogue life). Conservative Judaism, meanwhile, continues to try to synthesize tradition with modernity.

The United States is a far more religious country than Canada, and it seems to be becoming even more so. Fundamentalist Christianity has come to prominence within the American conservative movement, which has also included space for Judaism, notably its more Orthodox variant. But increasing religiosity in America is seen by many American Jews as a double-edged sword, leading to greater support for Israel but perhaps challenging a long-held liberal consensus among Jews about many areas of domestic policy.

While American Judaism draws on its own rabbinic seminaries and educational institutions, Judaism in Canada is a branch-plant operation. Reform, Conservative and Reconstructionist Jews in Canada are all completely dependent on their American counterparts for infrastructural support and, more importantly, for major rabbinic seminaries. Only recently has there been an increase in Canadians who receive ordination in the United States and then return to Canada.

Religious friction between the Orthodox and non-Orthodox seems to be less pronounced in Canada than in the United States. Moreover, with the rise of a new post 9-11 and post-intifadah wave of anti-Semitism and anti-Israeli sentiment, one senses that Jews have lessened their internal conflict across the denominations.

Jews in Politics

American Jews remain more active in politics and have more political clout than their Canadian counterparts. The fact that roughly ten out of 100 U.S. senators have recently been Jewish, and most in areas where there are few Jewish voters, reflects this. Jewish representation in Parliament is much lower. As well, the selection of Joe Lieberman as Al Gore's running mate in the 2000 presidential election was without precedent in both American and Canadian politics. Lieberman was the first Jew – and an observant and identified Jew at that – to come as close as he did to leading either country as a potential president or prime minister

While Jews in both countries remain largely identified as liberals, speculation has been growing about the degree to which Jews might be moving rightward across the political spectrum. Estimates are that in the 2004 U.S. presidential election, about 24 per cent of U.S. Jews voted for President George W. Bush, up from about 19 per cent in 2000. Thus, while Jews remain overwhelmingly Democratic, there are some signs of slippage. It's not clear if Canadian Jews outside Quebec have shifted away from the Liberals (and NDP) towards the Conservatives, though the latter have espoused tough positions in support of Israeli security.

Holocaust denial persists

The Jewish vote, and the Jewish lobby, is now being juxtaposed in both countries against the Muslim/Arab vote and lobby. In both countries, the latter have developed increasing sophistication. Jews in Canada are influential in political parties and causes, and they are prominent as donors and fundraisers, though less so than in the United States. In these activities, Jews generally act as individuals and rarely as part of an official coordinated campaign led by formal communal organizations. But the informal networks linking Jewish politicians and Jewish communal leaders have a life of their own, and Jewish communal leaders on occasion get involved in party politics. The best example is former Canadian Jewish Congress president Irwin Cotler, who is now the federal minister of justice.

Jewish political clout is greater in the United States than in Canada. The American political system, with its distinction between its legislative and executive branches, gives American Jews more points of leverage to influence policy than does Canada's parliamentary system. As well, compared to American Jews, Canadian Jews are more likely to be foreign born and thus less acculturated into politics. In addition, they are a smaller proportion of the population, and the international stakes are not as great in Canada on any issue on the Jewish political agenda, especially Israel, so Jewish political mobilization and participation in Canada is less important, and less effective. It remains to be seen if new organizations such as the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) will begin to approach the levels of influence long enjoyed by the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) in the United States. The recent criminal charges laid against AIPAC officials relating to the alleged transmission of classified information to Israel may weaken AIPAC's influence.

The future of ethno-racial coalition politics in both countries is dicey. Newer minority groups are non-white and low-income, while Jews are perceived – accurately – as affluent. Black-Jewish relations in Canada are still good, at least compared to the United States, where the black-Jewish coalition has been under siege for decades. How long can this Canadian inter-group honeymoon last? The political demography for Canadian Jews is changing for the worse as the proportion of visible minority immigrants increases. A similar trend is affecting American Jews as the proportions of Latinos, blacks, and Asians increases.

But this is not because of overt racism on the part of Jews and visible minority immigrants. In advocating for its interests, the Jewish community has been able to draw upon common experiences with other European immigrant groups, for whom the Holocaust and support for Israel are part of a shared historical discourse. Many non-Europeans do not share the same frame of reference. These groups bring their own historical legacies of slavery, colonialism, economic exploitation, warfare and even genocides. For them, Jews and Israel are allied with the wealthy and with western powers. The Holocaust does not resonate in their historical memories. Jewish communal leaders face a more difficult future, particularly in the aftermath of 9-11 and ongoing tensions in the Middle East.

Anti-Semitism

Compared with much earlier periods (and certainly by comparison with most western societies), anti-Semitism is not a major problem in either country. By conventional measures, it's on a long-term decline. On the other hand, in the United States, incidents of anti-Semitism tripled between 1980 and 2001, and in Canada, there was an 88 per cent rise from 1996 to 2002. The challenges of a new anti-Semitism focused on Israel may be greater in Canada than the United States for geo-political reasons.

Traditional forms of anti-Semitism exist in both societies, and traditional anti-Jewish stereotypes and prejudices are found in national surveys and usually concentrated among the less educated. Holocaust denial persists as a staple theme.

The major focus of contemporary anti-Semitism is the link between Jews and Israel. Anti-Semitism in both countries is linked to anti-Zionism and a spectrum of critiques of Israel, from a one-sided shrill opposition to certain Israeli policies to an opposition to the legitimate existence of the Jewish state. Much of this opposition is found among the intelligentsia, academics, the media, Arab/Muslim communities and traditional anti-Semitic groups.

Second most important Diaspora community?

While anti-Zionist and anti-Israeli anti-Semitism has an old pedigree, it has been given renewed currency in the post-9-11 war on terror environment, as well as by the second intifadah and the Iraq war. Canadian anti-Semitism is also nourished by anti-Americanism, which is strong in English Canada and even stronger in Quebec. The so-called "Bush-Sharon axis" argument serves to link people opposed to American foreign policy to those opposed to Israel, and it finds a Canadian resonance.

Meanwhile, the relative degree of support for Israel in the United States is astounding. A recent poll found Americans have greater sympathy for Israel than the Palestinians by a margin of 42 to 14 per cent. In European countries, these rates are reversed. One assumes that even if the Canadian figures are midway between the two, there is still a large gap with the United States. The CBC's stated policy to maintain even-handedness by avoiding the terms "terrorist" in its broadcasts is just one symbol of this Canadian environment.

In summary, the Jewish community in Canada is on its way to becoming the second most important Diaspora community, after the United States. The quality of Jewish life in Canada is higher, as is Jewish participation in American life. Ironically, there are forces promoting convergence between the two Jewish communities. More and more, Canadian Jews are moving to the United States for educational and job opportunities, while the rate of cross border marriages seems – we have no clear data—to be high and rising. The rise to political prominence of such openly committed Jews as Joe Lieberman and Irwin Cotler is another sign of greater acceptance. As well, it's not clear if the greater degree of Jewish traditionalism in Canada will withstand the passing of the larger immigrant cohorts there.

Yet at the same time, there are growing divergences in the environments of the two societies that affect Jewish life. The greater religiosity in the United States leads at the same time to stronger support for Israel, while making some liberal Jews uneasy at a perceived re-introduction of religion, and Christianity, into the public sphere. And in Canada, the increasing opposition to American foreign policy, with its perceived linkage to support for Israel, may make Canadian Jewish support of Israel more difficult.

Making philanthropy meaningful for the next generation

By MAXYNE FINKELSTEIN

In today's language, credit card companies often speak about "getting in the pocket" of adolescents and young adults as they establish their lifelong spending habits. One of the greatest challenges of philanthropic organizations is to "get in the pocket" of this same population as they establish their lifelong giving habits.

There is no doubt that in a consumption-oriented society, young people are expected to begin adulthood with a drive to live large and acquire the things that will bring comfort and status. At the same time, how many of them simultaneously consider how to live large as philanthropists and acquire status as they add social capital to society?

Every few months, I read new articles asserting either that philanthropy and the appended volunteer sector are thriving or that they are in slow decline. I consult with colleagues involved in fundraising and they are either celebrating the great achievements of their campaigns or despairing at the disconnect of the next generation. While this can be seen as the proverbial "glass is half full or half empty" scenario, it is more likely related to the vision and capacity of organizations and individuals to evolve with time and generations.

In his 2001 publication, Study of the Transition of Communal Values and Behaviour in Jewish Philanthropy, Gary Tobin of the San Francisco-based Institute for Jewish and Community Research, asserts that philanthropy reflects community values and norms, that what the community thinks as a whole is often reflected in patterns of giving.

As Tobin says, there is no doubt today that philanthropy has become a significant vehicle through which we shape and reflect on our communal agenda. Our major philanthropic institutions are not just fundraisers but community developers, thought leaders and, most importantly, intergenerational educators.

We use philanthropy to reach out, communicate messages, network, create identity and define ourselves and others. Philanthropy provides a common language for communication within the community and beyond it. Philanthropy serves as a platform to unite the Jewish community and as a means for connecting with the larger population.

In preparing to write this article, it was useful to gain some historical insight. In reading a publication of Jewish Studies – Jewish Life in Canada, one finds reference to The Canadian Eagle (Keneder Adler), the first organized Canadian Jewish news source. It is interesting to note that the newspaper was initially published in Yiddish, but in 1907, its owner stated that his objective was, according to Quebec professor Pierre Anctil, to "defend Jewish interests in Canada, keep the flame of traditional Judaism alive in the country, encourage the practice of philanthropy and support the idea of social justice."

Approximately 100 years later, following the great horror of the Shoah, the dynamic development of the State of Israel and with the fourth generation of Jews thriving in Canada in substantial numbers, Jewish philanthropy continues to be the most significant aspect of our communal economy: a barometer of who we are, what we care about, and the values we choose to support. In scanning any edition of The Canadian Jewish News or any other community media sources, print or electronic, one quickly absorbs the significant role that philanthropy plays in shaping our community. Education, philanthropy and the causes of social justice are what we focused on in 1907. Today, very little has changed in our community – while almost everything has changed.

Philanthropy relates to our most basic selves. Along with encompassing the tenets of tzedakah in its most basic and complex forms, the act of being charitable extends well beyond our communal activities.

Giving charity is a voluntary act, one that is clearly a part of our civil tradition and dialogue. It also reflects a sense of power, since it involves making a decision as to what we will personally support. Charity is inexorably linked to social environment for many: what do your peers, family members and colleagues support and what social activity surrounds the act of giving? Personality and personal relationships are key – who asks is often key to whom you give to. In the Jewish community, these issues often intersect with our relationships with organized religion and Israel, creating a strong and intense combination of emotion and values.

Today, many organizations involved in philanthropy struggle with the daily dilemma of being relevant to successive generations of donors. In the Jewish community, relevance must be approached from a different perspective. From a business transaction perspective, we are the purveyors of multiple products that reflect our essential values, and if we fail in presenting these products successfully, we will not only lose our current customers but risk disconnecting from successive generations as well. Philanthropy in the Jewish community has without a doubt become the primary net through which we connect with large numbers of our community, either directly or indirectly. As a result, those organizations that relate to the community carry a significant responsibility, as the carriers of our most treasured asset – the capacity to pass on our fundamental values in a meaningful and interactive forum.

Organizations must be able to serve as agents of change

This year, the United Jewish Communities (the umbrella organization of the 190 Jewish federations in North America of which 10 are the Canadian UJA/CJA federations) adopted the theme of "Live Generously." Supported by an extensive distribution of the now ubiquitous rubber bracelet, the tagline has caught on across this country and is now embedded as a theme in many federations. For the first time in many years, we see a change from emphasizing only money (give generously) to one that relates to individual lifestyle. This change clearly reflects the idea that philanthropy involves both action and passion, as well as a relationship with your credit card.

Canada has a long tradition of relying on non-profit and voluntary organizations to address the needs and interests of its highly diverse population. We have the second-largest not-for-profit and voluntary sector in the world. It is interesting to note that according to Statistics Canada 2001, not-for-profit and voluntary organizations employ the equivalent of more than two million full-time positions – two-thirds in paid positions and the remainder as volunteers. This represents about 12 per cent of the country's economically active population. More than three-quarters of Canadians make a charitable donation annually and more than one-quarter offer volunteer services. The philanthropic and non-profit sector in Canada accounts for 8.5 per cent of GDP when the value of volunteer work is included.

The Jewish community in Canada clearly transcends the above trends. The number and scope of not-for-profit organizations is vast. In Canada, Jewish philanthropy is thriving, both in the central federations and beyond. Along with annual campaigns, foundations, endowment funds and capital contributions are increasing annually.

While charitable giving amongst Jewish organizations in this country lacks comprehensive documentation, the UJA/CJA campaigns, which form the single largest source of Jewish community donations in Canada, raised over $120 million in 2004 and predict increases in this year. These organizations, which today are critical to the well-being of the organized Jewish community in Canada and to federation partnership organizations in Israel, are responsible for significant numbers of human resources – both volunteer and paid. The Canadian Jewish community benefits from some of the largest per capita donors and is among the most organized and most affiliated communities outside of Israel (far surpassing the United States). With a relatively low rate of out-marriage – 35 per cent – and a very high level of connection to Israel with 66 per cent of adults having made one visit to the state, the opportunities to connect with a receptive audience are significant.

The same themes that separate successful businesses from those that fail are common to philanthropic endeavours. Organizations capable of articulating a vision, maintaining focus and responding to a changing marketplace are most likely to endure and thrive. One of the most significant changes in charitable donors today is their interest in "causes," as opposed to organizations. Whereas organizational confidence was at one time a single quality that could ensure success, this is no longer sufficient. Donors require a point of passion with which to connect in order to feel valued and maintain a continued affiliation.

It is not enough anymore to be competent administrators of funds (although this must be a given), but organizations must be able to project their ability to serve as agents of change. The activity that surrounds fundraising must be considered part of an important event or series of events. In a media-clogged world where tuning out with your iPOD is always an option, charities compete to carve out a significant space in every day activity. The recent Live 8 concerts were certainly an example of good intention and a great event viewed by billions of people. We can only hope that the results will bring a better quality of life to those targeted for aid by the organizers.

In the Jewish charitable world, we are surrounded by good causes. That being said, what differentiates those that can speak to the next generation from those that will have difficulty? In all likelihood, it will be three dimensions: clarity of purpose, inspiring vision and a sense that repairing the world is a real possibility through this cause. What will potentially lead others to stumble includes the a lack of focused objectives, a perception of a complex bureaucracy overwhelming the cause, and leadership that turns to the past rather than the present or the future in making decisions. If donors know that social justice is being served by their resources, they will continue to support the organization as their sense of responsibility and gratification grows.

A great asset of the Jewish community is the ability to articulate our purpose through tzedakah. Tzedakah, which is presented as an important commandment (rather than a voluntary act), calls for repairing the world. Through tzedakah we can reinforce ethnic, cultural and religious identity while applying it to the larger issues of social justice in society. Furthermore, we are expected to defend our place in society and to combat anti-Semitism and anti-Israelism. These become the imperatives through which we call Jews to action.

The next generation will have a very different relationship with their Jewish roots than their parents did. At the same time, we should not revise history and long for a Jewish fantasyland where the vast majority were affiliated, donating heavily to Jewish causes, supporting the secular institutions as well and funding a full Jewish education for their children. While this world never actually existed, there is a longing for a time when ensuring continuity of identity was simpler because we lived with fewer choices. This should imply not that times were better, but that lifestyle choices were likely fewer and easier to anticipate.

Today, most Jews by birth are Jews by choice when it comes to action. One can choose to commit to or ignore a Jewish act, including tzedakah. Freedom to choose one's lifestyle implies freedom to choose "no" and vote with one's feet or by inaction. Our community is fortunate in that, for the majority, there is no reason for this to happen. We are the owners of perfect products to promote with the next generation. They are based on a core of values that are shared by the majority in our society, with justice and democracy being as fundamental as our history as a people.

As we have learned from birthright israel, one of the greatest platforms for communicating our vision is Israel. The many facets and avenues through which to explore and understand Israel allow Jews to see the opportunity to connect and contribute, regardless of personal belief or practice. With the knowledge that the paths are many, we have the opportunity to fold and refold our community cloth so that each generation can choose the right pattern to suit its own interests.

This openness to new approaches brought forward the notion of "venture philanthropy" in the 1990s. While neither a major trend nor a means of supporting the core of philanthropic work, it has successfully impacted the Jewish not-for-profit scene. By applying the principles that encouraged Internet startups, it encouraged young people with some assets to bring their tolerance for risk and knowledge of business to the community table. In a context of minimal bureaucracy, it allowed a new group to get to know the community in its own way and enabled the larger institutions to learn the interests and habits of the younger donor. This is a generation of donors who view themselves as investors and have a great interest in understanding their return from an emotional and practical perspective. While not making money, they want to be sure they know and understand who is achieving a better quality of life as a result of their contributions.

The philanthropic sector in Canada is thriving. Organizations with strong forward-looking visions and clarity of purpose and action will gain the most. Jewish philanthropy will continue to thrive with a complete understanding of the Jewish environment of giving, beyond basic (yet critical) fundraising goals, a well-defined market and an empathetic understanding of the motivations of the next generation.

The Canadian Jewish polity

By HAROLD M. WALLER

Polity is not a term that is conventionally used in describing the organized life of Canada's Jews. Nevertheless it is a useful concept that helps us understand just what it means to be part of the Canadian Jewish community.

Clearly not every Jew who resides in Canada is part of the community in a meaningful way; many choose not to affiliate with organized Jewish life at all. But the vast majority of Jews do affiliate in one way or another, thereby coming together to form a community that is based on membership in the Jewish people. Insofar as that community has governing institutions that make decisions that affect its members, it constitutes a polity or political system.

From its beginnings with tiny numbers of Jews in the 18th century, the Canadian Jewish community has grown, largely through immigration, to its present size of more than 370,000. This may not seem large compared to the huge community to our south, but Canada is now the third-largest Diaspora community after the United States and France. It is also one of the few that is growing, has an active, participating and committed membership, and is known for the quality of Jewish life. As a result, the representatives of Canada's Jews are major players in the affairs of world Jewry.

Characteristics of a Jewish polity

When we read the Bible, our tendency is to view it through the lens of religion because it is in the religious context that most of us have encountered Tanach. However, it is possible to read the Bible while emphasizing its literary or historical aspects or even its political prescriptions. There are political themes in rabbinic literature as well.

During the biblical period, the Jewish people constituted themselves politically as a nation and indeed lived an independent existence in Eretz Yisrael for extended periods amounting to more than a millennium, until the Romans finally extinguished Jewish sovereignty and subjugated Judea after the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE. For the next 1,900 years, Jews were dispersed among the nations of the world without the opportunity to implement the structures of government found in the Torah. The restoration of Jewish sovereignty in the State of Israel after 1948 meant a resumption of the struggle to give meaning to traditional views about the nature of politics and government.

During the long period from 70 to 1948, Jews were never able to live as a sovereign nation. However, they did form local communities and sought to live autonomously and with as much control over their internal affairs as the host polity would permit. Within these communities, they set up governing structures as well as a variety of other religious, educational and welfare institutions. Jews throughout the world exercised a strong sense of collective responsibility for other members of their communities and acted accordingly. Communal life was particularly strong in certain geographic areas, such as eastern Europe, from which most of Canada's immigrants came before the middle of the last century. It is no surprise that those who built the foundations of Canadian Jewish life were imbued with the values of shared responsibility that are so critical for an effective community.

The history of community organization

The natural thing for Jews to do in a new land was to organize at the local level, within the cities in which they lived. Immigrants naturally set up synagogues, schools, cultural bodies, health and welfare organizations, and social service agencies. Their primary concerns and needs were local. Moreover, transportation and communication realities were deterrents to organizing beyond their own communities.

Immigrants typically employed models from their own experience in Europe, which of course is what they knew best. During the early years of the 20th century, when immigrants were arriving in appreciable numbers, larger cities like Montreal and Toronto soon began to reflect the diversity of community life and interests in their Jewish institutional structures. In both cities, significant community institutions were created by the first decade of the 20th century. Between the two cities there were about 10,000 Jews according to the 1901 census. The rapid growth of Montreal and Toronto Jewry after 1901 necessitated more complex organizational arrangements, a Federation of Jewish Philanthropies, in each city by 1916. These were the first attempts to coordinate the activities of the various independent service agencies.

After World War I, the community took a major and innovative step through the establishment of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), which was envisioned as a "parliament of Canadian Jews," a representative body that could democratically determine policy on behalf of the community and represent it to governments and non-Jewish groups. The main objectives of Congress were political and focused on combating anti-Semitism, domestic community and government relations, and representing Canadian Jews to foreign governments, international institutions and worldwide Jewish bodies. Looking back, the founding of the federations in 1916 and Congress in 1919 reflected a willingness and intent to divide the work of governing the community. Congress would represent Jews to external bodies, while the federations as umbrella organizations would concentrate on the internal operations of the community. The latter were not seen as inherently political but rather as carrying out a community welfare function.

Smaller communities could not afford the more elaborate structures of Toronto and Montreal. At first they opted instead for community councils that often worked closely with CJC on community relations. Subsequently many of them developed federation structures of their own.

Between the world wars, the community continued to grow in numbers, although the notorious restriction of immigration in the years before World War II is well-known. The population growth brought a proliferation of organizations and later a consolidation. Congress, which had gotten off to such a promising start in 1919, had to suspend operations in 1922 due to a lack of support. But it was revived in 1934 because of the evident need for self-defence against the scourge of anti-Semitism and has continued to operate ever since.

Despite the fact that the Canadian Jewish community had been slowly gravitating toward an American model, Congress stood out as a unique national body, one in which all Jewish organizations could participate. That in itself was a strength but also a problem. The constituents of CJC were organizations, not individuals. The various organizations sent delegates to Congress, which then elected officers and other leaders. In the long run, the lack of a base of committed individual members proved to be a serious handicap. Inadequate funding sources compounded the matter.

The demands of meeting the needs of less fortunate members of the community during the Depression years led Toronto's Jews to transform the existing federation into the United Jewish Welfare Fund in 1937. The Montreal federation became Allied Jewish Community Services in 1965. The developments in both cities were indicative of a perceived need to centralize the planning and budgeting functions and to rationalize the activities of what became the constituent agencies. Most importantly, community fundraising was eventually centred on these two bodies, a development that proved to be exceedingly important for future evolution.

Other organizations also emerged during the first half of the century. These included B'nai Brith, with origins in the United States, which became a distinctively Canadian operation by the late 1960s, and the various Zionist organizations, especially the Zionist Organization of Canada and the Labor Zionist organization. By mid-century, Canada's Jewish communities boasted a broad range of services and institutions. For the most part, these remained local in their orientation. The main body that gave a country-wide focus to Jewish communal life was Congress.

Since 1950 and particularly around the time of the Six Day War in 1967 and during the 1990s, some major changes took place. The experience of the Six Day War made Canadian Jews, who were strongly oriented toward Israel anyway, even more conscious of the role of Diaspora communities in Israel's struggle for a secure existence. That led to the formation of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) in the aftermath of the war and the inauguration of systematic efforts to promote pro-Israel ideas in the public and the media and pro-Israel policies in government. Originally the CIC was a joint venture of CJC, B'nai Brith, and the Canadian Zionist Federation (formed in 1967), but later the federations became involved as well. Issues of providing a budget for a new body like the CIC necessitated the involvement of those who controlled discretionary community funds, namely the federations. In general, the 1970s and later decades saw a great stress on the Israel connection in both fundraising and programming by the federations.

The last 30 years have been a period of significant structural change in the community, which has been given an increasingly national focus. The need for activities and programming connected with Israel, both internally and externally, has been substantial ever since 1967, though the events since 2000 in particular have accentuated the need. Trends that had been underway since the '70s, such as centralized budgeting for country-wide needs, were intensified by the political environment during the terror war that was unleashed on Israel after 2000.

Long before 2000, the 10 federated communities in the country had formed the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada. In 1998, it merged with the United Israel Appeal of Canada to form UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC). That body, with a firm grip on the allocation of funds provided by the local campaigns for country-wide purposes, then moved to reorganize the institutions that functioned beyond the local level. The major initiative, consummated in 2004, was to establish the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA). It was given oversight responsibility for CJC, CIC, and National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL), which meant that the political agencies operating with central community funds would be under unified direction for the first time. Clearly this move reduced the autonomy of Congress, which faced a curtailment of its functions, but supporters of the reorganization contended that the savings from the rationalization of missions plus the intensification of the programmatic focus of the various groups made the undertaking not only worthwhile but essential to the furtherance of the community's interests.

In reviewing more than a century of community self-government, there are some clear generalizations that can be made. The main one is that the federations have transformed themselves from primarily welfare organizations into the effective governments of the community. If a primary function of a government is to raise revenue, primarily through taxes (or their equivalent), and then to decide how to spend that revenue, the federations, individually and collectively, undoubtedly meet that test. Obviously we cannot carry the analogy with government too far; federations, unlike the governments of countries, do not have a monopoly on the use of force and really are unable to use compulsion at all. But in the context of a voluntary community, the contention that the federations do act as the equivalent of governments is persuasive.

The other generalizations relate to specific organizations. Obviously the autonomy and capacity for independent action by CJC have been curtailed. Congress still exists and has some important tasks, but the pre-eminent position in the community envisioned by its founders in 1919 and even by its leaders as recently as 20 or 30 years ago is beyond its reach. On the other hand, B'nai Brith Canada has retained its autonomy and independence because of its ability to raise funds on its own.

The Canadian Jewish polity in 2005

Clearly the local federations are the backbone of the political system. They raise the money and therefore expect to decide how it will be spent. Influence in UIAFC generally reflects the ability of a federation (or one of the approximately 40 unfederated smaller communities) to conduct successful campaigns. However, the formal structure is not the whole story. For example, the initiative that resulted in the creation of CIJA operated through UIAFC but was inspired and promoted by an independent group of large and influential donors. This is hardly a new phenomenon in the politics of the Jewish community. Precisely because annual campaign donations are ultimately voluntary, large donors have long been able to exercise disproportionate influence, at least in specific situations.

There is no doubt that the new structure reflects a greater degree of centralization than has ever been the case in the past. However, the resources available to UIAFC remain limited. Most of what the federations raise is allocated and spent at the local level on the various agencies that provide services to members of the community. Another large chunk goes to Israel via the United Israel Appeal. What comes under the purview of UIAFC is the amount, about $25 million, that the federations and non-federated communities make available for national activities. But it is precisely what UIAFC does control that gives it such significant power in determining how the community will function at the national level. Essentially, through CIJA, it specifies the mandate of each national body, sets the mission and provides the wherewithal to carry out the mission.

There are two main reasons why this centralization has occurred. The first is that the federations' competitors over the years have generally been unable to maintain independent sources of funds (B'nai Brith being the major exception). Groups without a major funding basis simply could not compete. And secondly, the crisis relating to Israel has necessitated more vigorous and focused action than was possible under previous structures.

B'nai Brith has managed to retain a high profile and an active program. As things have evolved, it has taken on something of a maverick role. Since it is not bound by the consensus positions that emerge from UIAFC and CIJA, it is free to stake out positions on such topics as anti-Semitism and Israel that might be more assertive and more demanding than those coming from other communal bodies. And because it does have its own membership base to which it is responsible, it has greater latitude than other organizations.

Another organization that tries to function at the country-wide level is the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF), which brings together the various party-oriented Zionist groups. But it has suffered from a lack of funding, having relinquished its role in fundraising about 40 years ago, and has declined significantly in importance as a result. Constituent Zionist groups, however, do still carry on their own programming but tend to be removed from the major areas of community politics. This is particularly noticeable in the area of Israel advocacy, where the Zionist perspective used to be an integral part of the process.

The religious movements, generally arms of their U.S. counterparts, do operate independently but tend to have a relatively narrow focus. Their main job is to provide service to their affiliated congregations and the members of those synagogues. They tend not to be involved in community governance issues.

The role of the Jewish public

One difference between a Jewish polity in the Diaspora context and a general political system such as that of Canada is the voluntary character of the Jewish community. Theoretically everyone who is Jewish belongs to the community, but in practice many people choose to opt out or not to affiliate at all, either because they are not interested in organized Jewish life or because they find that a specific sub-community meets their Jewish needs adequately. Precisely because the community is organized on a voluntary basis, individuals must opt to affiliate in some way in order to be included. One common way is to join a Jewish organization, religious or otherwise. In today's environment, probably the most inclusive way of demonstrating participation in the life of the polity is to make an annual contribution to the fundraising campaign of the United Jewish Appeal or comparable body.

In principle every person who donates to the appeal has a voice in determining the policies of the body that makes authoritative decisions on behalf of the polity. That is usually the local federation. But in practice, although formal elections are held, the proportion of the relevant Jewish population that participates in choosing the leadership is quite small. Formally, maintaining annual donations signifies consent. However, typically the federations do not have a process for grassroots participation in elections. Moreover, elections are often a formality because they are not contested. Officers and board members are nominated and approved because they are active in organizational affairs and are perceived to have leadership skills. Interestingly, Congress, which prided itself on its democratic process, has had contested elections for president in the past, some of them quite contentious.

What about decision-making on policy matters? Again, there are formal mechanisms for making policy. But on major initiatives there is typically consultation with major contributors, whether or not they hold official positions. After all, if their donations are voluntary, they must be satisfied with the policy direction if they are to maintain their level of giving.

Conclusion

The Canadian Jewish polity is highly organized and enjoys legitimation through the consent represented by the ongoing participation of most Jews. Over time the federations have become the main address for what can be considered community government. The federations represent what political scientist Daniel Elazar termed "a trusteeship of givers and doers," a model that is common in the Jewish political tradition. The model of democratic participation that was the dream of the founders of CJC has not prevailed. Even so, there is increasing need to find ways to accommodate opposition to official positions. Future challenges are likely to centre on efforts to buck trends of apathy and lack of affiliation and commitment that have plagued other Diaspora Jewish communities. The combination of assertive Jewish identities among Canadian Jews and strong ties between the community and Israel augurs well for the future.

Harold Waller, professor of political science at McGill University, is the author (with the late Daniel J. Elazar), of The Canadian Jewish Polity, which won the National Jewish Book Award in 1991.

By MICHAEL BROWN

Canadian Jewish history starts with a woman, Esther Brandeau, who arrived in 1738 disguised as a male Christian sailor.

The adventuresome girl wanted to experience the world in ways then impossible for either women or Jews. In Canada, she was quickly unmasked. But men greatly outnumbered women in the colony, and an additional female, even one who had arrived in drag, was welcome. Jews, however, were proscribed. When Brandeau refused to convert, she was sent back to France.

A decade later another young French-Jewish woman, Marianne Perious, arrived in New France disguised as a man. She, however, preferred life in the New World to being Jewish and became a Catholic.

Brandeau and Perious provide a unique opening to the Canadian Jewish experience. What followed has been more "normal."

The formative period

Throughout the 19th century, Canada was a frontier society, its Jewry a frontier community. In 1901, after almost 150 years of Jewish settlement, there were fewer Jews in Canada than in Buffalo, N.Y. Canada remained a country of open spaces that seemed perched on the periphery of civilization, certainly Jewish civilization.

The frontier locale had different implications in Canada and the United States. The U.S. was born in rebellion against the Old World, and the frontier has meant preferring the new and untried over the customary, and the individual over the group. In their frontier melting pot, Americans put the past behind them and set out to create a new person and a new society. Canada was born in fealty to ancien régime France and then to the British crown. It reacted to the frontier by seeking to preserve the traditions of its two founding (European) peoples. The template for Canadian society is the mosaic in which each ethnic and religious tile remains distinct. Multiculturalism, official policy since the 1970s, has broadened the mosaic conception; in theory, it was intended to strengthen it, although that may ultimately not be its effect. Canadian conservatism has had implications for gender, ethnicity and religion.

One aspect of Canadian traditionalism has been the assumption that women should accept their traditional roles and confine their activities to the private and personal spheres. Until after World War II, most professions were considered neither "ladylike" nor "respectable" for the well-to-do. The working and lower-middle classes, however, were "permitted" careers in domestic service, child care, shopkeeping, and, later, factory work.

In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, a few middle-class Canadian Jewish women broke with prevailing norms and enjoyed successful careers, although mostly in the "ladylike" fields of education, health and the arts. One was Caroline Hart, a great-granddaughter of Aaron Hart, Canada's pioneer Jewish settler. Caroline Hart headed the Toronto Normal School kindergarten department from 1885 to 1892 and is considered the founder of Toronto's kindergarten system. But even education, a typical career for second-generation Jews in the U.S., was not welcoming to Jews of either gender in Canada, where religion permeated the "public" schools. Hart herself left Canada for the more open United States.

A second aspect of Canadian traditionalism was segregation enforced mostly by social sanction. In many respects, the various groups that make up Canadian society have led separate lives. These include the French and English nationalities and the ethnic communities that followed them; the religious groups: Catholics (divided into French, Irish and others), Protestants of differing denominations, then Jews, and finally Muslims and adherents of non-Western religions; and also men and women. Besides the mosaic conception, ethnic, religious and gender prejudices fostered segregation in Canada.

When their numbers were still quite modest, Jews began to organize their own communal life, first synagogues and cemeteries, then charitable, educational and political institutions. Canadian synagogues have tended to the present day to be more conservative and, as a result, more male-oriented than their American counterparts, where frontier-life equality was reflected in synagogues early on. Mixed seating became the norm among Americanizing Jews – though not recent immigrants – early in the 20th century; sisterhoods and ladies' auxiliaries assumed a major role in congregational affairs earlier.

As late as 1953, there were but three Reform synagogues in Canada. At the largest, Toronto's Holy Blossom, the 1894 constitution permitted only limited membership rights to widows and unmarried adult women and none to married women; separate seating at the important services obtained until 1920; and only in 1921, some seven decades after the congregation's founding, was a Temple Sisterhood formed to "espouse such… causes as are particularly the work of Jewish women." To this day, the constitutions of some Toronto Orthodox congregations restrict the number of women who may be elected to the congregational boards of governors to a fixed percentage of the male governors.

If women took a back seat in the religious life of the community, in charitable work they became a driving force early on. In Calgary, St. John, Ottawa, and elsewhere, women organized the first Jewish charities. Looking after the needy is a Jewish religious obligation, and since it was an activity deemed appropriate for females, Jewish women channelled religious fervour in that direction. By the turn of the 20th century, women's charitable societies were proliferating across the country differentiated from one another by task, class and members' place of origin in Europe. In Toronto, these included the Jewish Endeavour Sewing School, to teach girls a marketable skill, provide space for socializing and religious indoctrination, and combat Christian missionaries; the Ezras Noshem Society, to provide mutual aid to members and a free loan society (in 1921 the society purchased a building to house the new Mount Sinai Hospital); the Hebrew Young Ladies' Boot and Shoe Society to provide shoes to the poor; and the Hester How (Public) School Mothers' Club with the ostensible goal of keeping girls from shoplifting on Saturdays, but really to provide a venue for instruction in Judaism. The Mothers' Club eventually evolved into the city-wide, non-sectarian Home and School Association.

Several national women's organizations also emerged in the early years of the 20th century. The National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW), imported from the U.S., attracted middle- to upper-middle-class women, often adherents of Reform Judaism interested in social service to Jews and gentiles. Katie de Sola, wife of the outspoken Orthodox Rabbi Meldola de Sola of Montreal's Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, brought the NCJW to Canada in 1898. In 1940, it boasted more than 2,000 members and 600 "juniors" in Canada and claimed to be "the only [national] Jewish organization in Canada concerned with local and national [rather than Zionist] problems."

Most politically engaged Jewish women in these years worked within the Jewish community. In 1910 in Montreal and in 1917 in Toronto, for example, Jewish women protested the high price of kosher bread. In Toronto, a boycott was enforced by picket lines at bakeries, groceries and restaurants. More than once, women removed bread from shelves and display cases; deliveries were suspended ostensibly out of fear for the drivers' safety. Prices came down but probably as a result of market forces.

Union activity, socialism and communism were popular in Canada's Jewish communities in these years, especially among immigrant workers. One expects to find such groups more egalitarian than others. But here, too, the watchword was often "separate and not necessarily equal." According to historian Irving Abella, "no strike would have been possible without" women's support. But women "were allowed to play only a minimal role in the Jewish trade unions." Toronto's communist Freiheit Club offers an instructive example of Victorian norms operative in a left-wing setting. The club directed women members into the Jewish Association of Progressive Women with responsibility for children's activities. The women ran a summer camp and Sabbath morning classes in Marxist ideology.

Of the pre-1920, mixed-gender Jewish organizations, it was Zionism that accorded women a position of power. From its inception, women participated fully in the activities of the Federation of Zionist Societies. Separate women's Zionist organizations emerged, as well: the Daughters of Zion in Toronto in 1899 and then elsewhere; B'noth Zion Kadimah; Herzl Ladies' Societies; Herzl Girls; Red Mogen David; Nordau Girls; De Sola Girls; the Young Ladies' Progressive Zionist Society; the Jewish Women's League for Cultural Work in Palestine; Hadassah-WIZO; and, later, the labour Zionist Pioneer Women (now Na'amat Canada), and Emunah Women, the women's arm of the Orthodox Zionist organization, Mizrachi. But women "were also members of the main body to which they paid per capita dues." In 1903, Belle Maude de Sola of Montreal, the wife of federation president Clarence I. de Sola, Mrs. Manolson of Montreal, Ida Lewis (Siegel) of Toronto, and Mrs. Livingstone of Ottawa were elected federation vice-presidents. Women were certainly "under-represented" in those years, and after 1911 they were not elected to major federation office until the Zionist Organization of Canada (ZOC) was reorganized in the 1920s. But this was a greater level of equality than in any other major Canadian Jewish organization of the time.

Ottawa's Lillian and Archie Freiman were Canada's premier Jewish power couple from 1910 to '44. Archie was president of the ZOC from 1920 until his death in '44; in 1919, Lillian "readily consented to become the generalissimo" (national president) of Hadassah, a post she held until her death in 1940. Under her guidance, Canadian Hadassah declared its independence from American Hadassah and affiliated with London-based WIZO, the Women's International Zionist

Feminist notions helped erode conservative attitudes

Organization. British ties provided Old World roots and legitimacy for Canadian Jews caught between French and English. Hadassah-WIZO became the largest Jewish women's organization in Canada, although, unlike American Hadassah, it never overshadowed the ZOC, and it has been largely apolitical.

Canadian Jews were pulled toward Palestine out of romantic idealism and loyalty to the Jewish people, and because "the fate of the new Jewish settlements [there was]... bound up with the fate of Great Britain," Canada's mother country. They were pushed in that direction because, more so than in the U.S., they felt "alien to their surroundings." As Molly Lyons Bar David, a columnist in the American Hadassah Newsletter and an immigrant to Palestine from western Canada, observed, not without irony, Canadian Jews "were not plagued by the idea of dual loyalties as many American" Jews were.

A changing community in a changing country

When Canadian society began to open up and prejudice to diminish, and when the boundaries defining Canada's ethnic, religious and gender groups began to blur, is hard to pinpoint. Although World War II and its dislocations had an effect, change did not seem very evident at the time. Contributing to the fight against Nazi Germany involved "joyful offerings of time and self" for Canadian Jewish women. But the Red Cross permitted them to participate in its activities only through a segregated "Jewish Branch" or through Hadassah-WIZO or the National Council of Jewish Women, which turned over funds or handiwork to the gentile organization.

Social worker Ethel Ostry and relief agency worker Charles Jordan with one of the more than 1,000 war ophans who came to Canada in 1948 through the assistance of the Canadian Jewish Congress. [CJC archives]

By the late 1950s, the sense of living in a frontier community had dissipated, as Canada assumed a prominent role in international affairs, and Canadian Jewry grew into one of the world's significant Jewish communities. In 2005, Canada no longer appears to be guided by the conservative impulse to preserve the traditions of the past. Openness to non-European immigrants, the decline of religious fervour among many (Catholic Quebec has the lowest birth rate of any Canadian province), the Supreme Court ruling and federal legislation of 2004-05 legalizing same-sex marriage, the general concern with inclusiveness, a fairly permissive approach to soft drugs and sexual relations, all point away from the old Canada. Like other Canadians, most, although certainly not all, Jews in 2005 are less dedicated to traditional values than their forebears.

From the late 1960s, feminist notions including personal fulfilment and equality, and the devaluation of homemaking contributed to the erosion of conservative Canadian attitudes. Feminist scholar Sheva Medjuck has argued that there is no inherent conflict between the values of Judaism and those of feminism. But middle-class Jewish women have certainly shifted some of their energies from community volunteering to working in the marketplace and from family to career. And many began to work toward equality in Jewish religious life, which more traditional Jews opposed. Still, a 1991 survey of Montreal Jews revealed that 80 per cent valued most highly a happy marriage and raising a family (women more than men with regard to the second).

Notwithstanding social change, the communal life of Canadian Jewish women has retained a recognizable shape. While volunteerism has declined in North America, it remains at a fairly high level among Jews and higher among Jewish women than Jewish men. Hadassah-WIZO, for example, claimed a membership of 15,000 women and 1,000 male "life associates" in 2004 in 34 cities. As it has since its inception, Hadassah continues to support Israeli institutions including Jerusalem's Youth Aliyah Child Guidance Clinic.

The National Council of Jewish Women has responded to new and newly recognized needs. Since 1985, the group has sponsored Auberge Shalom in Montreal, the first Jewish women's shelter in Canada. It was established in response to the murder of a local Jewish woman by her husband and deals generally with domestic abuse, a phenomenon often acknowledged reluctantly in the Jewish community. In 2004, the shelter hired an Orthodox professional to deal specifically with that sector of the community. Emergency shelters are also maintained in several cities by Jewish Women International – formerly B'nai Brith Women.

In women's education, much innovation has taken place in recent years. Especially interesting are some new thrusts in adult women's education, particularly in Toronto. One is the Mekorot Institute of Torah Study for Women, which aims "to make a full range of traditional Jewish texts available [in]… an atmosphere of spiritual and intellectual growth." Another new initiative in Toronto is Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning. Founded in 1991 by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, the first woman rabbi hired by Holy Blossom Temple, Kolel "encourages [women and men] students to experience, learn and understand traditional Jewish thought and practices and apply them in our modern world."

A recent example of women's political organization is the Canadian Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get, a highly effective lobby that has sensitized the community to the problems of agunot (women whose husbands refuse to grant the religious divorce required by Orthodox and Conservative Judaism and Israeli law before they may remarry). Within the community, there has been broad, but not unanimous, support for change. Acting together with other groups and individual women and men, the coalition succeeded in effecting legal relief for agunot through a 1990 amendment to the Canada Divorce Act. Ironically, however, resorting to civil enforcement of Jewish law (Halachah), while undoubtedly necessary, serves to undermine the authority of the community.

Many Jewish organizations in recent decades demonstrate both continuity and change, remaining exclusively Jewish but no longer exclusively male. Where women were once accorded only a supporting role, they now occupy leadership positions. The Allied Jewish Community Services (now FEDERATION CJA), elected its first woman president, Dodo Heppner, in 1983. In 1995, Sandra Brown became the first woman president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (now UJA Federation of Greater Toronto), and the Vancouver federation has also been led by a woman. In 1987, the Canadian Jewish Congress elected Montrealer Dorothy Reitman as its first woman president.

Internationally, Canadian Jewish women have assumed leading roles in new organizations and in others once led almost exclusively by men. Women were in the forefront of the Struggle for Soviet Jewry in the 1980s, and Judy Feld Carr led a largely one-woman, 25-year, successful battle for the freedom of Syrian Jews. Israel is the major concern of Canadian Jewish organizations and individuals. Here Julia Koschitzky stands out, having chaired the Keren Hayesod World Board of Trustees and co-chaired the Jewish Agency for Israel Education Committee.

In the once all-male preserve of worship, marked change is also manifest. Since the mid-1980s, women have served continuously as (assistant or associate) rabbis at Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple. Other Toronto synagogues have engaged women clergy, and women rabbis have served pulpits in Vancouver, Halifax and elsewhere in Canada. New rituals for women, such as the bat mitzvah and the simchat bat celebrating the birth of a girl, are coming into general use, and greater involvement of women in synagogue worship is occurring in all denominations, ranging from full participation in egalitarian synagogues to annual special events such as dancing with the Torah scroll on the Simchat Torah holiday in some Orthodox synagogues. The first all-women's prayer group in Canada started in Montreal in 1982 and has met monthly since in Shaar Hashomayim and the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, both Orthodox congregations. In 1993, the group published its own prayer book.

Rather more dramatic than the changes in Jewish community life are changes that have occurred in the lives of individual women. By the turn of the millennium, Canadian Jewish women were participating in business, the media, the arts, politics, the civil service and the academy. Three Jewish women have served in the federal Parliament, two of them as cabinet members. Several have been nominated to judgeships, most notably Rosalie Abella, the daughter of Holocaust survivors, who was named to the Supreme Court of Canada in 2004. In 2000, Myra A. Freeman was appointed lieutenant-governor of the province of Nova Scotia, the first Jew to occupy that post in any province. A respected educator and community worker, Freeman is a public Jew who serves kosher food in Government House in Halifax. In the universities, Jewish women now teach in various disciplines, many taking an active role in Jewish affairs. Norma Baumel Joseph of Concordia University, for example, is a leading feminist activist, Orthodox Jew and Jewish studies scholar. Judy Rebick, who holds a chair in social justice at Ryerson University, was a founder of the Ontario Coalition for Abortion Clinics and was president of Canada's largest women's group, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women.

Looking ahead

Until quite recently, Jewish women have directed their energies toward the Jewish community and their families. Like other Canadians, they sought to preserve inherited traditions while seizing some of the opportunities for innovation offered by the North American frontier. Since the mid-20th century, Canada has become more open, democratic and egalitarian. The lines demarcating the tiles of the Canadian social mosaic are now less clear. Like most other Canadians, Jewish women participate widely in groups or activities once reserved exclusively for others. Haredi Jews, both men and women (like Mennonites, Doukhobors, and a number of new immigrant groups), still succeed in isolating themselves from the mainstreams of Canadian and Canadian Jewish life. But even they are not unaffected by developments in the larger society, such as the recent changes to the Canada Divorce Act.

Norma Baumel Joseph

The plus side of the Canadian mosaic has been a strong Jewish community (and other communities) that nurtured traditional ethnic and religious values and benefited from the talent and energy of women and men inhibited from participating in the broader society. The minus side has included considerable anti-Semitism and, especially for women, the constraints of community and tradition that have kept some from fulfilling their potential. The extraordinary achievements of individual Canadian Jewish women in recent years testify to their talents and hard work, but also to the suppression of such talent earlier. While individual women and men have benefited from the openness of the present day, the Jewish group, too, has benefited, from the decrease in prejudice toward Jews and women and the fructification that comes from interaction in a diverse society. On the other hand, the community survival of Jews and other groups is harder to ensure in an open society than it was behind the protective borders of a mosaic tile.

The future, of course, is impossible to predict. The first Jewish woman in Canada arrived with her womanhood and her Jewishness concealed. When they became known, the colony's governor offered her the choice of conversion or expulsion. Esther Brandeau's "descendants" have lived increasingly open lives, and today in Nova Scotia, the lieutenant-governor is Jewish and offers her guests kosher food. Who wudda thunk?

Bora Laskin – a great Canadian

By MARTIN L. FRIEDLAND

Bora Laskin was born in 1912 in the Lakehead, now called Thunder Bay, the son of immigrant parents. His father had come from Belarus to Winnipeg earlier in the century and a few years later had married Laskin's mother, who had come from Latvia with the expectation that the two would marry. They later moved to the Lakehead (then composed of the twin cities of Fort William and Port Arthur) around 1908 because of greater economic opportunities. The family spoke Yiddish, which was Laskin's first language.

The Laskins were part of a small Jewish community. The 1901 census shows only 13 Jews at the Lakehead. Laskin became very involved in the Jewish Community. Indeed, at one point the Laskins lived next to the synagogue. Laskin spoke Hebrew fluently and taught it at the Fort William Talmud Torah. At his bar mitzvah in 1925, he delivered a 45-minute sermon in Hebrew and at the party in the evening played Hatikvah on the violin. He was later the president of the local Zionist youth club, Young Judea.

But it is not as a Hebrew scholar that he was best known in the Lakehead. It was as a baseball player. He played semi-professional baseball there and was said to have been scouted by the Chicago White Sox. He hit the longest home run in the history of Fort William. When my friend Harry Arthurs visited the Lakehead many years ago he asked a taxi driver whether he knew of Bora Laskin. The driver replied: "Oh yeah, I knew Bora. He was a helluva baseball player. I wonder whatever happened to him."

Bora Laskin

Legal education

Laskin was an excellent student and became the high school class valedictorian. He entered the University of Toronto as a student in September 1930, graduating with a BA in law three years later. It was not a carefree time to go to university. A sacrifice had to be made by the family to send Laskin to Toronto because he entered the U of T the year after the stock market crash of 1929. His brother Saul, later the mayor of Thunder Bay, was not financially able to attend university during those years, but as it turns out was able to receive his BA from Lakehead University many years later when in his 80s.

There was widespread anti-Semitism in Canada at the time, as is well documented by Irving Abella and Harold Troper in their well-known None Is Too Many, and by other authors. The Christie Pits riot in Toronto took place in 1933. I note that when Bora and Saul and their spouses named their sons, they both chose the name "John." The two Johns became distinguished lawyers. John I. Laskin is a member of the Ontario Court of Appeal and John B. Laskin is a senior litigator at Torys.

Laskin's undergraduate life at U of T – as well as other aspects of his career – is well documented in Philip Girard's fine biography of Laskin, soon-to-be published by the Osgoode Society and the University of Toronto Press. I highly recommend it. As a Jew, Laskin automatically enrolled in University College – the non-denominational "godless" college. He became involved in student politics, becoming the literary director of the University College Literary and Athletic Society, and was active in debating and sports, particularly track and field and rowing. He also joined a Jewish fraternity, Sigma Alpha Mu.

The law program, headed by Dean W.P.M. Kennedy, attracted students who became leaders of the profession – Charles Dubin, William Howland, G. Arthur Martin and Sydney Robins, to name only some students who later became members of the Ontario Court of Appeal. Perhaps their success was because they were inspired by Kennedy's view that legal education should "create a body of citizens endowed with an insight into law as the basic social science, and capable of making those examinations into its workings as will redeem it from being a mere trade and technique and… make it the finest of all instruments in the service of mankind."

Laskin was taught by Jacob Finkelman, a graduate of the honour law program, who had a special interest in labour law. Finkelman, who died in 2003, had started teaching the year that Laskin arrived and no doubt influenced Laskin's lifelong interest in labour law. Finkelman, I should note, was the first Jew to be appointed to a full-time position at U of T.

The Law Society of Upper Canada gave no credit for Kennedy's law course. Laskin therefore had to enrol in Osgoode's law program, which combined lectures and articling. Before he was permitted to enrol, however, he had to find someone who would give him employment and sign his articles. In his first year at Osgoode, he was "employed" by his fraternity brother Samuel Gotfrid, who had received his call a year earlier, but could not offer his articling student very much work or remuneration. The following year, Laskin articled for a non-Jewish lawyer in the same building, who had a busy real estate practice, which no doubt accounts for Laskin's later interest in land law. He graduated near the top of his class at Osgoode, just as he had in Kennedy's honour law program.

The larger non-Jewish law firms did not hire Jews in those years. Indeed, the hiring of Jews by the major firms, with a handful of exceptions, did not start until the 1960s. When I graduated in 1958 and went to seek advice from Laskin about where to article, he naturally sent me to a Jewish firm – just as he sent all the other members of my small study group, Harry Arthurs, Harvey Bliss and Gerry Grafstein, to Jewish firms.

After his call to the bar, Laskin went to Harvard Law School on a scholarship, where he came under the influence of some of the greatest names in academic law – Felix Frankfurter in administrative law, Roscoe Pound in jurisprudence and Zechariah Chafee in equity. When he returned to Toronto, he could not find a job teaching or practising law with a large firm. He was unsuccessful in obtaining satisfactory work with a Jewish firm and so did summaries of legal cases for the Canadian Abridgment – a job that paid twice as much as he later earned when he began teaching.

In 1938, shortly after he returned from Harvard, Laskin married Peggy Tenenbaum, who had received her BA in household science from the U of T in 1933. Her family had moved from Campbellford in eastern Ontario to Toronto around 1930. She was the first Jew to be hired by Eaton's. She was loved for her warmth and affection by everyone who knew her. She and Bora were very close and, as frequently happens in life, she died two months after Bora's death in 1984. Their son John was born in 1943, during Bora's third year of teaching. Barbara, their second child, was born in 1950.

Appointment as a law teacher

When Larry MacKenzie, a member of the staff at the University of Toronto Law School, resigned in 1940 to become the president of the University of New Brunswick, Kennedy had the opportunity to hire a replacement. Kennedy was very fond of Laskin and Laskin was one of the two candidates he considered for the position. The other was J.K. Macalister, someone I had never heard of until I did research for my book on the history of the University of Toronto. Macalister had graduated from Kennedy's law course in 1937, with, according to Girard, the highest marks ever recorded in Kennedy's program – an A in every subject in every year. He won a Rhodes scholarship to Oxford, where he obtained a first, and later topped the standings for the English bar exams.

In the late summer of 1940, MacKenzie's appointment at UNB became official and Kennedy could offer an appointment. He offered it to Macalister, who had earlier expressed an interest in teaching at U of T. Macalister cabled back immediately: "In army since yesterday sorry many thanks – Macalister." The appointment was then offered to Laskin. How much Laskin knew of the offer to Macalister is not known, but he would obviously have known that Macalister was a serious competitor for the position. Both of Laskin's two younger brothers, Charles and Saul, joined the Canadian army in 1942.

To complete the story, Macalister had joined the Canadian infantry, was later assigned to British intelligence, and along with another U of T graduate was parachuted behind enemy lines in France in June 1943 to act as a secret agent. They were captured, tortured and executed at Buchenwald concentration camp in September 1944.

Law teaching

Laskin taught at U of T until he left for Osgoode Hall Law School in 1945, returning to the university in 1949. This was part of the move by the president of the University of Toronto, Sidney Smith, and the then-dean of Osgoode, Caesar Wright, to establish a professional law school at U of T. Laskin joined Wright and another great law teacher, John Willis, in the move to the university. Smith wanted to establish at the university, in his words, "a law school that would rank first in Canada, and be among the leading schools of the North American continent." The immediate cause of the move was a reactionary report by the Law Society Benchers on legal education. As it turned out, the Law Society did not recognize the university law school until 1957.

My classmates and I were fortunate. We had chosen to attend the U of T Law School, thinking that we would lose a year in the process. As it turned out, we did not have to attend Osgoode Hall Law School, but instead took part in the first year of the newly created bar admission course after our articling period.

We had Laskin for three subjects, real property in first year, constitutional law in second year and labour law in third. Today, most professors concentrate on one area of law, perhaps two. Laskin specialized in all three areas. Laskin always had a tremendous amount of material to cover and so lectured most of the time. He left the Socratic method to others.

Although Laskin's door was always open and he would deal with whatever you wanted to discuss with him, he never had time for much chitchat at the law school. Many of us went to see him about where we should article. We were in and out of his office in less than five minutes. He was a no-nonsense professor. He was more relaxed when not teaching or at his desk. I have it fixed in my mind that during my two years as a student at the law school's temporary quarters at the Glendon estate, he would sometimes walk with us down in the Don Valley forests between classes. It is possible, I admit, that those walks never actually took place. I am, however, sure that he and Peggy came to my wedding at the end of third year. In later years, like many others, I often turned to him for advice.

As an academic, Laskin had always been busy with outside assignments, giving opinions, conducting labour arbitrations, involved in faculty association matters, participating in civil liberties issues and writing government reports. He also wrote headnotes for the Dominion Law Reports, the case law series edited by Caesar Wright. I'm reasonably certain that his later appointment to the Ontario Court of Appeal in 1965 allowed him to slow down somewhat.

Perhaps his most important non-legal contribution to U of T was chairing an influential committee, established in 1964, on graduate studies. The committee was composed of 12 persons, including the eminent scholar Northrop Frye, scientist John Polanyi and Ernest Sirluck, the dean of the graduate school, who had been the first Jew appointed to a senior position at the University of Toronto. President Claude Bissell later called it "the strongest internal committee in the history of the university." The committee's unanimous report was written by Laskin. The result was a centralization of graduate studies in the university. This was no surprise to his former students. It reflected his constitutional view that it was desirable to have a strong central presence. The University of Toronto's graduate school has been a major factor in the present high reputation of U of T.

Laskin took a deep interest in Jewish affairs throughout his career, particularly before his appointment to the bench. He headed the legal affairs committee of the Canadian Jewish Congress and was a member of the board of Holy Blossom Temple and head of its religious education committee. He was also heavily involved in trying to eliminate discrimination; he prepared briefs that were used to strike down restrictive covenants that had been used to prevent the sale of lands based on religious and racial grounds. His activism helped show the need for the creation of the Ontario Human Rights Commission.

Appointment to the Bench

My wife and I happened to be having dinner with the Laskins at an Italian restaurant in London, England, in the summer of 1965 when Laskin was called to the telephone. He did not say anything about the call when he returned to the table, although it was clear to us that it had been an important conversation. We later found out that the call had been from the solicitor general, Larry Pennell, telling Laskin that the cabinet had appointed him to the Ontario Court of Appeal. Jerry Grafstein, who had close ties with the Liberal Party and had played an important role in the appointment, had tracked Laskin down at the restaurant. The announcement would not be made until the Laskins returned to Canada from their holiday toward the end of August and Laskin was asked to keep the appointment private.

Laskin was not the first Jew to be appointed to the Superior Court in Ontario. That honour belongs to Abe Leiff, who had been appointed to the trial division several years earlier. Nor was he the first Jew to be appointed to an appellate court. That honour belongs to Sam Freedman of Manitoba. Laskin's acceptance was a great loss to U of T because he was the clear choice to succeed Wright as dean.

Judicial career

Laskin spent five years as a member of the Ontario Court of Appeal and then at the age of 57 was elevated by Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau to the Supreme Court of Canada, the first Jew and also the first academic to be appointed to the Supreme Court. Three years later, he was made the chief justice of Canada by Trudeau. He was appointed over others with seniority, a departure from the usual practice at the time.

There is not space in this article to go into detail about Laskin's contribution to the law as a judge. He was often dissenting, particularly in his earlier years. He made major contributions in a wide range of areas – constitutional law, administrative law, family law, labour law, aboriginal rights, civil liberties, criminal law and private law. Many of these cases are still cited by courts and legal scholars.

He took a broad expansive view of the judicial role. In an interview with Sheldon Kirshner, published in the Canadian Jewish News in 1981, he spoke of the law as a "living force," adding: "You try to speak in terms that'll carry a given judgment beyond time and occasion." Girard rightly states that Laskin was a proponent of "responsive law, law as an instrument through which society sought to achieve its goals." One sees the influence of Dean Kennedy, quoted previously.

Laskin died just before the Supreme Court of Canada delivered its first judgment under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and so was not able to make an impact in that increasingly important area of law. But he influenced the manner in which the Charter was later interpreted because of his influence on members of the court, particularly his successor, Chief Justice Brian Dickson. Dickson had often joined Laskin and Wishart Spence in dissents – known by lawyers as 'LSD' dissents. He also indirectly influenced the enactment of the Charter. This was not because he was active behind the scenes, but because he looked and acted like a wise Solomon-like figure who the public could trust to deliver sound judgments under a new Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Final days

Laskin had a heart bypass operation in 1978 and subsequently had other serious health problems. He continued, however, to work diligently as chief justice. He did not want to retire, but illness kept him away from the court in 1984 and he died of pneumonia on March 26, 1984. He has subsequently been honoured in many ways, one of the most lasting being the naming of the law library at the University of Toronto as the Bora Laskin Law Library, which was officially opened in 1991.

I attended the funeral service in Ottawa at the Chevra Kadishah Synagogue and later went to the Holy Blossom Park Memorial Cemetery in Scarborough where he was buried. Those attending would all have agreed with Trudeau's comments that Canadians "had lost one of their greatest champions of equity and fairness." Bora Laskin was a great Canadian.

Martin L. Friedland is professor of law emeritus at the University of Toronto, where he was formerly the dean of law. This article is drawn from the author's personal knowledge and his recently published history of the University of Toronto, Irving Abella's article on Laskin's early years and Philip Girard's soon-to be published, Bora Laskin: Bringing Law to Life (Osgoode Society and University of Toronto Press).

A.M. Klein and the Canadian Jewish community

By ZAILIG POLLOCK

The most important fact about A.M. Klein is that he produced an inspiring and challenging body of work of great variety, intensity and beauty.

It is a body of work that demonstrates a knowledge and love of Jewish traditions unparallelled in English Canadian literature and, it has been argued, in English literature as a whole. Discussions of Klein's work frequently cite the comment by the Jewish American writer and critic, Ludwig Lewisohn, that Klein is "the first contributor of authentic Jewish poetry to the English language." There are many similar comments in the extensive critical literature on Klein, one of the most eloquent being that of the English critic William Walsh, who says of Klein's work that it "has in it all the richness, the inclusiveness, of the Jewish character and mind, the product of an ancient, sophisticated, oppressed, and still-living tradition."

Klein was pleased with Lewisohn's comment and, no doubt, would have been with Walsh's, had he lived to read it. Both comments, and many others of similar import, clearly reflect Klein's own sense of his role as a poet as he describes it in The Bible's Archetypical Poet, drawing on the language of the Bible, which he knew so well: "Rooted in the common soil, he turns his eyes to new directions. He is, indeed, a fruitful bough; he springs from earth fed secretly by a well; but his branches run over the wall. Thus are the ideas of convention and revolt, of tradition and innovation, conjured up…"

As he says in his great poetic manifesto, Portrait of the Poet as Landscape, "these are not mean ambitions; it is something merely to entertain them." And the scope of Klein's ambitions and achievement have been acknowledged again and again by his fellow poets, such as Dorothy Livesay, P.K. Page, Leonard Cohen, Leo Kennedy, Raymond Souster, Eli Mandel and Miriam Waddington – Jewish and non-Jewish alike – dozens of whom are represented in A Rich Garland, Poems for A.M. Klein, a unique tribute to a Canadian poet, edited by Seymour Mayne and B. Glen Rotchin.

But if the most important fact about A.M. Klein is the widely recognized greatness of his achievement as a poet, and a specifically Jewish poet, it is not the only important fact about him. For if Klein is the father of Jewish Canadian literature, as he has been called, he is a father who is, in a very real sense, absent. One of the most moving tributes to Klein by a fellow Jewish Canadian writer is The Almost Meeting by Henry Kreisel, which describes the narrator's failed attempt to meet with a reclusive writer who is clearly based on Klein in his later years. And this sense of frustration, of achievement cut short, of ambitions unfulfilled, haunts Klein's reputation. The obvious reason is that Klein suffered a catastrophic breakdown when he was in his mid-40s, at the very height of his creative power, from which he never recovered; and the breakdown colours most accounts of his career.

Whether this brute fact about his life is relevant to his work is an open question, but it is difficult not to see foreshadowings of his final collapse in the portraits that recur throughout his work of heroes of the imagination reduced to silence, isolation and frustration by the neglect of their community. These portraits inevitably suggest tensions in Klein's own relationship to his community.

The most beautiful and powerful of Klein's early poems is Out of the Pulver and the Polished Lens, a celebration of the philosopher Spinoza, who was exiled by the Jewish community of Amsterdam for his supposedly heretical ideas. This poem, which Klein wrote while in his early 20s, ends with a portrait of Spinoza, alone, infected by the tuberculosis that will eventually kill him, cut off from his fellow men, and, perhaps, even from God: "Think of Spinoza, rather, plucking tulips/ Within the garden of Mynheer, forgetting/ Dutchmen and Rabbins, and consumptive fretting,/ Plucking his tulips in the Holland sun,/ Remembering the thought of the Adored, /Spinoza, gathering flowers for the One, The ever-unwedded lover of the Lord."

'Ambition unfulfilled' a recurring theme

This vision of ambition unfulfilled, of the lover who must remain "ever-unwedded," recurs with even greater force in Portrait of the Poet as Landscape, where, after outlining the poet's ambitions as saviour of his society, Klein concludes: "Meanwhile, he/ makes of his status as zero a rich garland/ a halo of his anonymity,/ and lives alone, and in his secret shines/ like phosphorus. At the bottom of the sea."

Perhaps the most striking example of unfulfilled ambitions in Klein's work is The Second Scroll, in which the narrator's search for his messianic Uncle Melech ends in failure. Just as he seems to have arrived at the end of his quest, he discovers that terrorists have murdered his uncle and burnt his corpse: "Its features were unrecognizable… Thus was my Sabbath turned to mourning. Across the continents I had looked and searched for my kinsman, and now that I had found him – I would not ever look upon his face."

There are many, many other examples I could cite, but clearly an awareness of unfulfillable ambitions, of the impossibility of completing what he had set himself to do, is central to Klein's sense of himself as an artist. And this awareness is deeply rooted in his relationship with the Canadian Jewish community. Without this relationship with his community, the great joy and the great sorrow of his life, Klein's magnificent achievement as an artist would be inconceivable.

I believe that Klein's relationship to his community, so much more important to him than the relationships that tend to preoccupy other poets – with a lover, for example, or with nature or with God – could fairly be called tragic. But not all of Klein's fellow writers would agree. And this brings us to the bête noire of all lovers and admirers of Klein, Mordecai Richler. For Richler, the story of A.M. Klein, whom he presents in a thinly disguised form as L.B. Berger in Solomon Gursky Was Here, was not a tragedy but a farce. It is hard to imagine a less sympathetic portrait of one artist by another.

L.B. Berger is a hypocritical mediocrity whose reputation as a poet, such as it is, is due entirely to Canada's burgeoning, and absurd, muticultural industry: "He found himself, much to his astonishment, welcomed as an exotic garlicky pirate, living proof of the ethnic riches that went into weaving the Canadian cultural tapestry."

Hints of discomfort with community

But Richler's most serious charge against Klein/Berger is that he is a pathetic sell-out, the stooge of the repellent Bernard Gursky (i.e., Samuel Bronfman). Richler is, of course, focusing on Klein's many years of service as speechwriter and public-relations consultant to Samuel Bronfman, and, in a sense, the savaging that Klein suffers at Richler's hands is only collateral damage, a side effect of the main attack on Bronfman. But there is an intensity, a nastiness to the attack on Klein (Richler doesn't even bother to change the name of Klein's wife Bessie) that demands our attention. Where does this passionate intensity come from? Without getting too Freudian, it seems to me that the Oedipal is unavoidable. Though Richler would probably be the last to admit it, he is deeply indebted to Klein.

Saint Urbain's Horseman, for example, would be inconceivable without The Second Scroll. More to the point is the relationship of the narrator of Solomon Gursky Was Here to L.B. Berger and to Richler himself. Like Jake Hersh, Joshua Shapiro and Barney Panofsky, heroes of the bulky apologiae pro opinionibus suis, which Richler produced every 10 years or so in the latter years of his career, Moses Berger is one of Richler's Portraits of the Artist as a Flawed but Loveable Human Being. And, of course, Moses Berger is the son of the despised L.B. Berger. What this means, I think, is that Richler is defining himself and his own relationship to this community by attacking Klein, the father figure, whom he sees, as rebellious sons tend to do, as his exact opposite.

Most people would probably agree that, as far as their relationships with their community go, Richler and Klein are, indeed, exact opposites. Although I think it is absurd to accuse Richler of anti-Semitism, as some have done, his basic stance toward the Jewish community is satirical. The satire is sometimes good-natured, sometimes not, but satire it always is. From Richler's point of view, to take anything less than a critical stance toward his community is dishonest, cowardly and self-serving, and these are his charges against Klein. Before dealing with these charges I would like to make the point that, although Richler would have had no way of knowing it, Klein's own attitude to the Jewish community, at least in some moods, was no less critical than Richler's own.

There are certainly hints throughout Klein's work of his discomfort with the community to which fate had so inextricably tied him. The contemptuous portrait of the "maculate sons of Abraham" in Out of the Pulver and the Polished Lens clearly reflects Klein's feelings about his own community, and this critical note is even more clearly sounded in political satires he wrote in the early '30s (including one, which Richler may have known, in which the central figure is named "Kleinburger").

But the strongest expressions of Klein's unhappiness with his community, and with the role he sometimes felt forced to play in it, occur in a number of works, for the most part unfinished, which were published for the first time in the Notebooks volume of his Collected Works, after Klein's death. I quote one passage from among many: "Rejoicing and drinks – the maestro's [i.e Samuel Bronfman] – at the planning of the final banquet of the annual philanthropic campaign. Everybody complimented by everybody, even me, who am only the author of its slogans – the proxy of the poor – the compiler of its sob-letters. Particular backslap for an anonymous poem about the grace of charity – Ah, the charm of gilded platitude – printed on the banquet souvenir-program. Poor me! poet parsleyate to a menu. Actually the sonnet was written only to avoid writing the sickening prose called for… But that I should write it at all…" Richler, if he had been aware of this material, would probably have criticized Klein for refusing to make his reservations public. He would have been wrong.

It is difficult for us – and it was clearly impossible for Richler – to fully appreciate the situation in which someone of Klein's gifts and ambitions found himself as he was coming of age as a writer and a Jew. To quote Richler for one last time, in Saint Urbain's Horseman, Jake Hersh, speaking as always for Richler himself, says of his generation: "Young too late, old too soon was, as Jake had come to understand it, the plaintive story of his American generation. Conceived in the Depression, but never to taste its bitterness firsthand, they had actually contrived to sail through the Spanish Civil War, World War II, the Holocaust, Hiroshima, the Israeli War of Independence, McCarthyism, Korea, and, latterly, Vietnam and the drug culture, with impunity. Always the wrong age. Ever observers, never participants. The whirlwind elsewhere."

Samuel Bronfman

This was very definitely not the story of Klein's generation. In his fine biography of Klein, Like One That Dreamed, Usher Caplan eloquently says of Klein's editorship of the Canadian Jewish Chronicle: "Quite by chance, Klein's term of editorship coincided with the most terrible and most glorious years in modern Jewish history. In his empathic sensitivity to the events of those years, Klein spoke personally for a nation, thereby revealing the complete range of his own emotions – his fears, his pain and despair, his quixotic outrage in the face of injustice, his sardonic wittiness, even his sometimes ghoulish attraction to the humorous side of tragedy, and his rare moments of jubilation."

Klein's editorials for the Canadian Jewish Chronicle, like his famous oratory on behalf of a range of Jewish causes, reflect, no less than his poetry, his deep commitment to his community – as does his speechwriting for Samuel Bronfman.

This is not the place to go into Klein's very complicated relationship with Bronfman, except to briefly make the point that it was complicated. Bronfman's failings are well known – his bullying, his social climbing – but what also must be acknowledged is that, as head of the Canadian Jewish Congress for nearly a quarter of a century, beginning in 1939, Bronfman gave the Canadian Jewish community a voice it had previously lacked, and some measure of influence on Canadian policy toward the survivors of the Holocaust and toward the State of Israel. The extent of this influence can be debated but what cannot be debated is that for many years the CJC, with Bronfman at this head, was the only game in town. Klein, with many reservations, chose to play.

What was the nature of Klein's reservations? There was the obvious one that his commitment to a role in public affairs (which also included running unsuccessfully for the CCF) diverted valuable time and energy from his creative work. Klein often expressed envy of writers like Rilke or Proust or Joyce who were able to devote themselves singlehandedly to their work, without the kinds of distracting obligations that Klein had to deal with on a daily basis. But it is impossible to imagine Klein sequestered in the equivalent of Proust's cork-lined room; and when his three-year, and very successful, stint in the ivory tower of the English department of McGill University came to an end, he made no attempt to renew it. He knew that for him, for the kind of artist he was, an engagement in the life of the community was at the very heart of his art.

Impact like few other writers

Klein had another reservation, however, which, I think takes us more deeply into his relationship – for good and ill – with the Canadian Jewish community. To put it bluntly, Klein felt that his artistic achievement was never properly recognized by the community. He, of course, was not the first artist in history to feel underappreciated. But for Klein, it was essential to his role as a poet that he be recognized and – this is the key – that he be influential. Klein was raised in a Jewish tradition which placed high value on community and on the duty of the educated members of the community to offer advice and guidance. Klein saw himself as an heir not only of the great English poets such as Chaucer, Shakespeare and Milton but also of the great figures of the rabbinical tradition, such as ben-Zakkai, Hillel, Akiva, Rashi and Maimonides. It was precisely their influence on the ways of thinking and feeling of their community that constituted the greatness of these figures. It caused Klein great pain and resentment to realize that whatever impact and influence he had on his community was due, not to his poetry, but to his speeches, his editorials, and, perhaps hardest to take, his speechwriting for Samuel Bronfman.

For this, he was in part to blame. Whatever one might think of his role as a public figure, in his art Klein was absolutely unable to compromise, to adjust his performance to public expectations. For example, Gloss Gimel in The Second Scroll, is one of the most moving accounts of a mind struggling to make sense of the Holocaust and of the human capacity for evil, and to construct an edifice of hope on a foundation of despair. However, to appreciate this stunning work of art, to make any sense of it at all, you should really be familiar, for starters, with Michelangelo's paintings on the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel and Charles de Tolnay's commentary on these paintings: with various kabbalistic doctrines, as formulated by Isaac Luria and expounded by Gershom Scholem; and with Joyce's Ulysses (and at least a bit of Finnegans Wake). It also helps to have more than a nodding acquaintance with Yiddish, Hebrew, Aramaic and Latin. Not all of Klein's writings are this demanding but many of them are, and while the rewards of mastering Klein's complexities and allusions are great, this kind of writing is not going to set the Jewish masses on fire. Klein, in other words, was caught between his ambition to have an influence on public affairs and his opposing ambition to explore, with all of his intellect and knowledge and creativity, the human condition in a time of great complexity and uncertainty – wherever this took him and whomever it left behind.

One final point about Klein and the Jewish community. I think that toward the end of his creative life, Klein himself was beginning to feel left behind. The Yiddish-speaking eastern European milieu, which he knew and loved so well as a child and adolescent, was beginning to yield to the inexorable process of suburbanization and assimilation that was sweeping through North America after World War II. As a result, many of the touchstones of his art – the Yiddish language and Yiddish culture and folkways, the Torah, the Talmud, Jewish liturgy and history – were becoming much less familiar to his potential readers. Readers nowadays need to prepare themselves for approaching Klein in ways that his contemporaries did not. This is true of myself, who understand some Yiddish but don't speak it, and who studied at a Talmud Torah until Grade 9. It is much more true of my children and my students.

So how vital a presence is Klein in the Canadian Jewish community today? Or perhaps it is better to ask, how vital a presence can he be if we are willing to make the effort of opening ourselves up to him? In some ways, the issues he addressed have changed beyond recognition in the half-century since he stopped writing; in others they have become even more compelling today. The struggle for meaning in a world that often seems meaningless; the need to serve others, while remaining true to oneself; the role of tradition and community in a world of increasingly faceless globalization, and the dangers of turning one's back on the world by retreating into tradition and community. From my experience of teaching Klein's work to Jewish and non-Jewish students alike, I can testify that, once the initial work of commentary and explication has been done, he has an impact like few other writers.

Klein and the world he celebrated, and criticized, are long gone, in some ways beyond recall; but we would be wise to imitate the act of imagination of the narrator of The Second Scroll, who says of his ever-elusive Uncle Melech: "Forever would I have to bear in my mind my own conjured image of [him]."

Zailig Pollock is a professor of English literature at Trent University. He is chair of the A.M. Klein Research and Publication Committee and has edited Klein's Complete Poems and co-edited his Notebooks and The Second Scroll. He has also written a study of Klein's works, A.M. Klein: The Story of the Poet.

Canada, Jews and the arts: A compendium of little-known facts

By BILL GLADSTONE

Jewish poets were composing lines and Jewish painters composing scenes long before Canada was founded; and, as evidenced in The CJN's weekly "Eye on Arts" column, there is no shortage of productive Canadian Jewish artists helping to enrich the nation's current cultural scene.

Many Jewish artists make productive contributions without any serious notice being taken of their Jewishness, especially if it does not seem immediately relevant. Yet the Jewish community retains bragging rights on each one of them.

Jewish achievement and influence in the arts in Canada and internationally is such a huge subject that any comprehensive treatment could fill a large volume. The following is an abbreviated and necessarily selective compendium of Canadian Jews and the arts.

There seems little point in singing the praises once again of "all the usual suspects." For example, both Mordecai Richler and Leonard Cohen are already international celebrities and their works are widely known, but relatively few readers know that their respective grandfathers also merit attention for their cultural contributions.

Generally speaking, the focus here is on the unusual, the obscure, the historical – and the many who made it big in the United States.

Poets, playwrights, novelists, critics

Mordecai Richler (1931-2001), author of The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, Barney's Version and many other acclaimed novels, was one of Canada's most celebrated modern writers. The Montreal literary legend also had the merit of being a grandson of the esteemed Rabbi Yehudah Yudel Rosenberg. Born in Poland in 1859, Rabbi Yudel translated the Zohar into Hebrew and penned many talmudist, halachic and kabbalistic works as well as belles lettres and short stories. In Toronto from 1913, he was rabbi of the Beth Jacob Congregation and founder of the city's first talmud torah (Eitz Chaim) on D'Arcy St. Moving to Montreal in 1919, he organized and chaired a Jewish beit din and served the community until his death in 1935.

Leonard Cohen, born in Montreal in 1932 and currently residing in Los Angeles, is one of Canada's most celebrated poets, singer-songwriters and novelists. He also has the merit of being descended from a distinguished Canadian-Jewish family.

His grandfather, businessman and philanthropist Lyon Cohen (1868-1937), was president of the Jewish Colonization Association in Canada, Baron de Hirsch Institute, Federation of Jewish Philanthropies, Canadian Jewish Congress (1919) and Montreal Vaad Ha'ir. He organized the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada and co-founded the Canadian Jewish Times, the first Anglo-Jewish periodical in Canada. Leonard's great-grandfather Lazarus Cohen and father Nathan Cohen were also pillars of the Canadian Jewish community.

Although usually associated with Chicago, Nobel Prize-winning author Saul Bellow (1915-2005) was born in a working-class district of Lachine, Que., and spent his first nine years in and around Montreal. His family moved into a flat on Saint Dominique Street in Montreal in 1918 when he was three, and to Chicago in 1924. On a return visit to Montreal in 1987, he visited some of his former neighbours whom he hadn't seen in 70 years or more. "The keenness of his memory astonished those who came to hear him," writes biographer James Atlas. "While Bellow was being interviewed at the Jewish Public Library, a man introduced himself as a person from the old neighbourhood. Bellow questioned the man closely about where he'd lived, then began to describe his interlocutor's father, his uncle, everyone in his household, 'as if it had all been yesterday.'"

Glasgow-born Isidore Gordon Ascher (1835-1914) is acknowledged as the first Canadian Jewish poet. He immigrated to Canada with his parents when he was eight years old and was later educated at McGill University in Montreal. He produced poems, novels and a play, and returned to England in 1864.

Born in Toronto, William Thomas Carroll Ryan (1839-1910) was a journalist, publicist and author of several books of poems. After serving in the Crimean War, he established the Ottawa Evening Mail (1870) and was city editor of the Ottawa Citizen (1871). He was editor of the Canadian Jewish Times, Canada's first Jewish paper (published in Montreal) from 1898. The paper was founded by Lyon Cohen.

Writer Bret Harte (1836-1902) wrote tales and poems of California frontier life. Born in Albany, N.Y., he was so thoroughly identified as an American writer that his Canadian Jewish roots are rarely mentioned: he was related to the prominent Hart family of Trois Rivières, Que. He visited Toronto in 1873 before a trip to England, and was delighted at the reception he received from what he considered the closest thing to an English audience that could be found on this side of the Atlantic.

Torontonian Robert Franklin Mirvish, younger brother of "Honest Ed" Mirvish, is an accomplished writer of romantic adventure novels and a former radio officer in the U.S. merchant marine, from which many of his stories were derived. His books include House of her Own (1952), Texana (1954) and Point of Impact (1961). "Mirvish is not the most original prose writer around... but he

Two scions of Montreal's prominent Roskies family have become leading scholars of Yiddish literature in the United States. Ruth Wisse, author of many works including the influential The Modern Jewish Canon: A Journey through Language and Culture (2000) became Harvard University's first professor of Yiddish literature in 1993.

Montreal author Lionel Shapiro (1908-1958) wrote three political novels including The Sixth of June (1955), a drama centred around the D-Day invasion. The book won a Governor General's Award and was made into a film starring Robert Taylor, Richard Todd and Dana Wynter. "In Shapiro's skilful and much translated works, the Jew becomes the messenger of conscience in a war-torn world," notes the Encyclopedia Judaica.

According to bibliographer Raymond Arthur Davies, the first novels published in Canada by a Jewish author were Mantle of Elijah (Toronto, 1900) and Jinny the Carrier (Toronto, year unknown), both written by Anglo-Jewish literary legend Israel Zangwill.

Artists and architects

Joe Shuster (1914-1992), the artist who created Superman with Jerry Siegel, was born in Toronto, son of a poor immigrant family and cousin to comedian Frank Shuster. As a boy he hustled papers for the Toronto Star, gaining familiarity with the sights and sounds of a big city newspaper. At 10, he moved with his family to Cleveland. After several early collaborations, Shuster and Siegel created the Superman comic strip that debuted in DC-National's Action Comics in 1938. It was an instant success that generated millions of dollars in annual sales. As the company claimed copyright on the superhero, the embittered co-creators sued in 1948 and won a relatively paltry settlement of $60,000 each. A second lawsuit in 1978 gained them lifetime annual pensions of $35,000.

William Raphael, considered Canada's first Jewish painter, was born in East Prussia in 1833 and reached Canada in 1860. A founder of the Royal Canadian Academy, he painted mainly landscapes and scenes of habitant life in Quebec, for example Wolves After a Habitant Sleigh (1875). He died 1915.

American architect Frank Gehry, designer of the Guggenheim Museum in Bilbao, Spain, and many other acclaimed buildings, was born Frank Owen Goldberg in Toronto in 1929. He moved with his family to California in 1947.

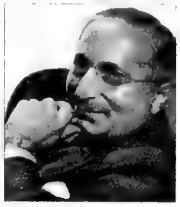
Hollywood moguls and directors

Louis B. Mayer (born in Ukraine in 1885), fabled head of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer motion picture studio, was raised in Saint John, N.B., where his father ran a junk metal business and his mother sold chickens. As a young man, he moved to Boston, built up New England's largest theatre chain and made a fortune distributing Birth of a Nation. After founding a film production company in 1917, he moved to Los Angeles and established MGM with Marcus Loew and Samuel Goldwyn.



Louis B. Mayer

The studio made many classics including the Andy Hardy series, Meet Me In St. Louis and The Wizard of Oz.

At his peak, Mayer was earning well over $1 million a year. He established the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences in 1927 and remained at MGM until 1951. Daughter Irene married film producer David O. Selznick.

Another Canadian close to Mayer was Montreal-born actress Norma Shearer, a Jewish convert who was married to Mayer's brilliant cohort, Irving Thalberg.

Jack Warner (born in London, Ont., in 1892) was the youngest of 12 children of Polish immigrants, and become a powerful studio head in Hollywood. His connection with film began when the family purchased a nickelodeon in Newcastle, Pa., in 1903. Four of the Warner brothers ventured into film distribution and eventually established the Warner Bros. production studio, which launched the sound era with The Jazz Singer (1927). Warner remained active as a producer until the early 1970s.

Arthur Hiller, responsible for The Out of Towners (1970), Love Story (1970), Plaza Suite (1971), The Man in the Glass Booth (1975), The In-laws (1979) and other popular films, was born in Edmonton in 1932. He served in the RCAF during the war, studied psychology at University of Toronto, and worked for the CBC before leaving for Hollywood in the late 1950s, where he worked on Gunsmoke, Alfred Hitchcock Presents and other TV shows. He and wife Gwen smuggled books and clothing to Russian Jewish Refuseniks in the early 1970s. He is a companion of the Order of Canada, holds a Governor General's Award, and received an honorary Academy Award in 2002.

David Cronenberg (born in Toronto in 1943) began making films while a student of English and science at the U of T. The film director, screenwriter and producer is considered a master of the macabre and the bizarre, as evident in such works as The Dead Zone, The Fly, Naked Lunch, Dead Ringers and Crash.

Spider (2002), featuring Ralph Fiennes as a schizophrenic, won the Best Canadian Film Award at the Toronto International Film Festival. Cronenberg's father, the late Milton Cronenberg, was proprietor of a bookstore on College Street in the 1930s and '40s.

Ivan Reitman was born in 1946. The Czech-born director-producer, who grew up in Hamilton, Ont., has been ranked alongside Steven Spielberg and Robert Zemeckis as a member of Variety's tiny coterie of box-office magicians known as the "Billion Dollar Directors" club. He began directing short films as a student at McMaster University in Hamilton. His first full-length project was the live TV series Greed; his first film, The Columbus Of Sex (1969) with partner Dan Goldberg, resulted in their arrest and conviction on old-fashioned decency charges.

Even as the trial proceeded, he produced the racy comedy Foxy Lady, then Cannibal Girls. In 1973, he teamed with David Cronenberg for the horror films Shivers and Rabid, and soon was producing successful shows on Broadway. In 1978 came National Lampoon's Animal House, followed by Stripes, Meatballs, Beethoven, Ghostbusters and other lucrative hits.

Writer, director and producer Sidney Furie, born in Toronto in 1933, got his early experience working for the CBC. His many projects include The Ipcress File (1965), Lady Sings the Blues (1972) and Gable and Lombard (1976). "Some of his movies, most notably his early films made in England have not only become cult favourites, but have achieved a status properly described by the word classic," writes one Internet reviewer.

Comedic duo funny and durable

TV comedians and legends

The comedic duo of Johnny Wayne (1918-1990) and Frank Shuster (1916-2002) were the most durable comedy act in the history of The Ed Sullivan Show, appearing 67 times, far more than anyone else.

They began their collaboration as Grade 10 students at Harbord Collegiate and continued at the U of T. They were known as Shuster and Wayne until their first radio program, Wife Preservers, on

Lorne Michaels

CFRB in 1940. They took their comedy routines to the Canadian troops in Europe where, as one of them quipped, they had the distinction of being shot at by both sides. Their CBC comedy specials regularly drew the largest TV audiences in Canada.

"Rinse the Blood Off My Toga" was probably their most famous skit for the Sullivan show. "I'm Flavius Maximus, private Roman eye," said Wayne. "My license number is XIX-VIXXI. It also comes in handy as an eye chart. If you can't read it, you're nearsighted. If you can pronounce it, you're Polish." Caesar's widow (played by Toronto actress Sylvia Lennick) had a New York Jewish accent: "I said to him, 'Julie don't go,' I said. It's the Ides of March, already."

Wayne's father, Charles Weingarten, was co-founder of Mizrachi Canada and his mother was a Mizrachi president. Shuster's father, Jack, was an early motion-picture projectionist in Toronto.

Torontonian Lorne Michaels (born in 1944) was the creator and executive producer of Saturday Night Live, the long-running late night television comedy show. He is also executive producer of NBC's Late Night with Conan O'Brien.

He attended the U of T and worked at the CBC. In 1968, he moved to Los Angeles and worked as a writer on NBC's Rowan and Martin's Laugh-In and other comedies. He began SNL in New York in 1975 and has produced a score of other successful programs, music specials and movies. He was formerly married to Rosie, former SNL writer and daughter of Frank Shuster.

Star of the classic TV western Bonanza, Lorne Greene (1915-1987) once said that he based his portrayal of the noble patriarch Ben Cartwright on his father Daniel Greene, a shoemaker who died three years before the first episode of Bonanza aired in 1959.

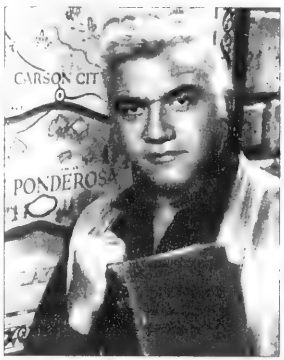
Born in Ottawa, Greene studied chemical engineering at Queens University in Kingston and acted and directed in the school's drama guild. After winning a fellowship to an acting school in New York, he returned home and became the "voice of Canada" for the CBC in 1939. He served as a flying officer in the RCAF during World War



Lorne Greene

II and afterwards founded Toronto's Academy of Radio Arts.

After some television work and major roles at Stratford and on Broadway, a spot appearance on TV's Wagon Train in 1959 led to the role on Bonanza.

After the show's last season in 1973, Greene starred in Griff, a short-lived detective series, and in the fleeting science fiction series, Battlestar Galactica. He also hosted Lorne Greene's New Wilderness.

To millions of diehard fans, he is the immortal captain James T. Kirk, heroic captain of the Starship Enterprise in the 1960s Star Trek TV series. Montreal-born actor William Shatner (born in 1931) reprised the role in a series of Star Trek movies, and even directed one himself. Besides writing several books about his Star Trek experience and some science fiction novels, he continues to act as well as write, produce and direct.

Desperate to find a last-minute replacement for an actress who was ill, TV star Jack Benny introduced his wife, Mary Livingstone (1906-1983) into The Jack Benny Show as a kind of "heckler-secretary" and wise-cracking family friend. Despite her stage fright, Livingstone (real name: Sadie Marks) became a regular on the show. Some sources give Vancouver as her birthplace, others say Seattle.

Let's Make a Deal, the high-energy TV game show that ran on NBC from 1963 to 1986, made co-creator and host Monty Hall into a celebrity. Born in Winnipeg in 1921, Hall was the epitome of the suave American talk-show host dangling prizes of cash, washing machines, new cars – and sometimes mules – before bedazzled contestants dressed in wild costumes.

Hall began his show business career in Canadian army shows during World War II. In 1945, he performed in musical and dramatic productions at the University of Manitoba while earning a science degree. Despite his "damned Canadian accent," he was eventually hired as a broadcaster in New York in 1955. He moved to Hollywood in the early 1960s.

Long associated with Variety Clubs International, he has helped raise millions of dollars for charitable organizations worldwide. He is a companion of the Order of Canada and has a children's wing named after him at Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto.

Comedian-actor Howie Mandel was born in Toronto in 1955. He attained prominence in the United States as Dr. Wayne Fiscus on the TV medical drama St. Elsewhere. He is known for his frequent appearances as a stand-up comedian and for his hidden camera segments on The Tonight Show with Jay Leno.

Mandel's career started by fluke during a 1979 visit to Los Angeles. The story goes that his friends coaxed him to the microphone on amateur night at the legendary Comedy Store, a producer hired him on the spot, and he's never looked back. He now lives in Los Angeles with his wife Terry and their three children.

Best known as band leader on The Late Show with David Letterman, Paul Shaffer's musical career began with a Toronto production of Godspell in 1972. He was also on Saturday Night Live, made many recordings and has appeared in numerous films including Disney's Hercules, in which he had a talking part. Born in what is now the city of Thunder Bay in 1949, he is a national spokesperson for Epilepsy Canada.

While a student at McMaster University in his native Hamilton, Eugene Levy (born in 1946) acted in a film by Ivan Reitman. He appeared with the Second City Troupe, the SCTV comedy show and in many movies. He is an advisor to the comedy program at Humber College in Toronto.

Torontonian Rick Moranis (born in 1954) was also with SCTV, appeared in numerous movies, and is also an advisor to Humber College's comedy program.

"Boy, age 12, shows genius as organist" read a 1945 headline after the first public performance of Torontonian Glenn Gould (1932-1982). A musical prodigy, he displayed absolute pitch, could read sheet music by the age of three, and was composing music at five.

The celebrated pianist, known for his electrifying interpretations of Bach, had a remarkable effect on the way people hear, perceive and appreciate music. His performances were relatively rare because concertizing made him "feel demeaned, like a vaudevillian." Instead, he reached a huge audience through film and studio recordings. His famous interpretation of the Goldberg Variations (1955) was a top-selling classical recording. The subject of many books and films, Gould died after a sudden stroke. A historic plaque marks his former residence at 110 St. Clair Ave. W.

Maureen Forrester (born Kathleen Stewart in Montreal, 1930) has been hailed as "the great contralto of her time, Canada's grande dame of song and one of this country's musical ambassadors to the world." She has performed and recorded with the world's great orchestras, holds a Governor General's Award and is a companion in the Order of Canada.

The fourth and youngest child of an Irish mother and Scottish father, Forrester grew up in a poor district in Montreal and left school at 13 to help support the family. Encouraged by her mother, she began singing in church choirs and taking voice lessons.

At 18 she applied to New York's Juilliard School of Music, but was rejected because of her lack of high school. After a 1953 debut recital in Montreal, she won recognition in Europe in 1955 and North America in 1956. A convert to Judaism, she married violinist-conductor Eugene Kash in 1957. She worked tirelessly for many cultural organizations, including the Canadian Opera Company, National Ballet of Canada, National Film Board and the Canada Council, which she once chaired.

As a driving force of The Band, Robbie Robertson (born in Toronto in 1943) is one rock's most influential and legendary figures. The son of a Mohawk mother and a Jewish father, he grew up in Toronto and spent summers on the Six Nations Reservation outside Brantford. He was active as a teenager in various local bands. His bluesy rock guitar style helped define the distinctive sound of Ronnie Hawkins & The Hawks.

When Bob Dylan went electric during his 1965-66 world tour, Robertson was in the backup group and, with other members of The Hawks, formed the unit that would become The Band. Whether touring with Dylan, recording solo albums or scoring Hollywood movies for Martin Scorsese, Robertson has been at the centre of the music scene since the late 1950s. He has won numerous Juno Awards, and with The Band, has been inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. He works today as a creative executive at DreamWorks Records.

Ben Mink, violinist, mandolinist, guitarist and composer, was born 1951 in Detroit of Polish parents and lived in Cleveland until age 11 when he settled in Toronto. A close associate of k.d. lang, with whom he has co-written songs and performed since 1985, he has also recorded with Dan Hill, Anne Murray, Raffi, Rush, Bare Naked Ladies and other artists. He produced many albums including lang's recent Hymns of the 49th Parallel, and recorded several of his own.

Geddy Lee, son of Polish concentration camp survivors, is the vocalist, bassist and keyboardist for the heavy metal group Rush, which has sold more than 40 million records internationally since 1974. Born Gary Lee Weinrib in Toronto in 1953, Geddy's official stage name was inspired by his mother's heavily accented pronunciation of his first name. He and band members Alex Lifeson and Neil Peart have won numerous Junos and been named to the Order of Canada, and raised more than $1 million for charity.

Frome. After hosting a New York radio show for several years he returned to the pulpit and served at Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple from 1943 to 1961. A strong social activist, he protested the war in Vietnam and met with Ho Chi Minh in 1967. He also joined John Lennon and Yoko Ono during their famed "bed-in" for peace in Montreal in 1969 and sang in the chorus of Lennon's Give Peace A Chance, recorded in a suite at the Queen Elizabeth Hotel. "Maybe we can bill ourselves as John Lennon and the Flaming Red Rabbi," he reportedly joked to the superstar Beatle. He moved to San Francisco in the '70s and died in Reno in 1986.

Bandleader, orchestrator and composer Percy Faith (1908–1976) was born in Toronto and conducted a live orchestra for the CBC from 1938 to 1940, when he moved to Chicago. Compositions include Delicado, Moulin Rouge and Theme from A Summer Place.

American playwright David Belasco (1853-1931) was born in San Francisco and lived from age five to 11 in Victoria, B.C. His parents were among the province's earliest Jewish immigrants. He reached New York in 1882 and scored many theatrical successes beginning with the Civil War drama The Heart of Maryland (1895). In 1907, he built New York's Stuyvesant Theatre, later renamed the Belasco. A mentor to filmmaker Cecil B. DeMille, he "has been ranked as a director on the same level as Tyrone Guthrie and Elia Kazan," according to historian Stuart Rosenberg.

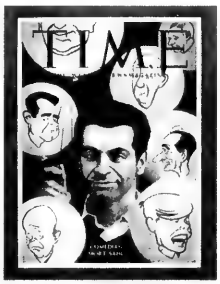
Lou Jacobi (born Jacobovitch in Toronto in 1913), a celebrated comic-dramatic actor with many triumphs, is perhaps best known for his role as the bread-stealing Mr. Van Daan in the film version of The Diary of Ann Frank. At three, he sang at a charity concert for Toronto's Jewish Home for the Aged. He made his theatrical debut at 12 in The Rabbi and the Priest at Toronto's Princess Theatre, performed stand-up comedy in Muskoka in the late 1940s and appeared in the popular revue Spring Thaw. He went to England in the early 1950s and eventually reached Broadway, where he played in Neil Simon's Come Blow Your Horn and Woody Allen's Don't Drink the Water. He appeared in the stage production of Anne Frank and was chosen by director Garson Kanin to appear in the film. Jacobi once accurately described his own look as "everyone's genial Uncle Max."



Mort Sahl

Born in Montreal in 1927, comedian Mort Sahl began to work as a stand-up comic while at university in Los Angeles. Like Lenny Bruce, he turned to the newspapers for his pungent brand of political satire, and his rapid, non-stop delivery earned him the nickname "Rebel Without A Pause." Success prompted record albums and appearances in movies and on American late-night TV. In 1960, he appeared on the cover of Time magazine, which dubbed him "the patriarch of a new school of comedians." Long a thorn in the side of U.S. presidents from Dwight D. Eisenhower to George W. Bush, he is still performing.

The exterior of Pier 21 today
[Pier 21 Foundation Archives]

Pier 21 – gateway to Canada

By RUTH M. GOLDBLOOM

Pier 21 Immigration Museum stands proudly as a national historic site. When you step through the doors of Pier 21, you do not simply walk in the footsteps of the one million people who passed through this landmark between 1928 and '71 – you also experience the emotions and feelings of every immigrant to this country, whether their journey brought them here 300 years ago or as recently as last week.

These are the people who changed the face of Canada. Today, Canada is one of the most multi-ethnic countries in the world; not surprising when you consider that with the exception of our aboriginal population, we are a country of immigrants.

In 1993, a group of Halifax volunteers dreamed of recreating and reviving Pier 21. Before long, our desire to rehabilitate the abandoned waterfront shed grew into an action plan and the dream gathered momentum.

Pier 21 reopened to international attention on Canada Day, July 1, 1999, thanks to a successful $9 million fundraising campaign that included support from the three levels of government and the private sector.

Pier 21 chronicles the story of Canadian immigration – why they came, what they accomplished and the significant role they played in building our nation.

At the reopening of the pier, Rosalie Abella, then a judge for the Court of Appeal of Ontario, now a Supreme Court judge, said,"I will never forget how lucky we were to be able to come to Canada, but I will also never forget why we came. These are the two stories which complete me – one joyful and one painful – and which merge in the next generation into a mother's irrevocable gratitude to a country which has made it possible for her children to have only one story – the joyful story, the Canadian story, the story that started at Pier 21."

For more than 40 years, the Pier 21 shed was Canada's front door to immigrants. Fleeing poverty, war, famine, drought, religious and political persecution, they journeyed to Canada in search of freedom and opportunity. During World War II, almost 50,000 war brides and their 22,000 children landed there; so did 3,000 British evacuee children; and 494,000 Canadian troops left from Pier 21 to serve overseas. We estimate that one of every five Canadians can trace a family connection to Pier 21. And, during the Pier 21 years, 69,776 Jewish immigrants and refugees came to Canada. Their stories are among the most compelling.

Canada once had "preferred" and "non-preferred" groups when it came to immigration, but the Depression years brought even stricter regulations. In 1930, an order-in-council began allowing in only those with enough capital to establish and maintain themselves on farms. The next year all non-agricultural immigration was banned unless the applicant was British or American. With these restrictions firmly in place as Hitler rose to power in 1933, the Jews of Europe stood almost no chance of escaping to Canada.

By 1938, the refugee crisis was acute and Canada was receiving hundreds of thousands of requests from European Jews. The Canadian Jewish Congress, the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society (JIAS), and the Atlantic Jewish Council joined together with thousands of ordinary Jewish Canadians to fight to gain sanctuary for these refugees.

A few fortunate Jewish families did manage to make it to Canada during this time to be welcomed at Pier 21. One of them was the Echt family, who in 1939 escaped from the Free State of Danzig shortly before the outbreak of World War II. As a pharmacist and a hobby farmer, Mr. Echt was uniquely situated to become one of the small numbers of Jews, 5,000 in total, who qualified and was given permission to enter Canada during the Hitler years.

The Echts settled in Nova Scotia in late 1939 and bought a farm. They were welcomed to Canada at Pier 21 by Sadie Fineberg, a representative of JIAS. This welcoming role was ultimately assumed by Mr. Echt's wife, Meta, a few years later. Meta's daughter, Marianne, eventually became her mother's constant companion at Pier 21.

While volunteering with JIAS, Meta and Marianne welcomed thousands of Jewish refugees. Among the most memorable for them were the Jewish war orphans. Cecelia Lockner Heinish Halzel was one of those orphans. Cecelia and her sister, Blanca, daughters of Razel and Moshe Lockner, were born in Ratowitz, Romania. Their parents died in a concentration camp, and they only escaped Auschwitz themselves because their aunt bribed a guard with a piece of gold jewelry. Miraculously, they managed to get away back to their hometown.

Eventually, contact was made with the late Noah Heinish in Halifax, who was a senior representative of JIAS and a volunteer at Pier 21. It took several years to get the necessary legal documents, but the sisters arrived at Pier 21 in 1948 aboard the SS General Sturgis. They were among 3,000 orphans on the ship coming to live with Canadian families. Though meant to continue their journey to Montreal, they grew attached to the Heinishes and stayed with them. As adults, they continue to keep the Heinishes' spirit alive with their involvement and financial assistance to Pier 21 and to the causes in which the Heinish family believed so deeply.

Pier 21 continues to be blessed with Marianne Echt as a volunteer guide. She graciously shares her family's story with visitors and schoolchildren and works in the research department helping other alumni preserve their important memories.

My own grandparents, Esther and Joseph Claener, had come to Cape Breton from Russia in search of two things: safety and opportunity. Like other immigrants, they took full advantage of both. My grandfather came to this country speaking only Russian and Yiddish, and it was decided he should spend some time as a peddler, travelling the back roads of Cape Breton with a horse and cart to become familiar with the new language and earn a living. A freak snowstorm in October made return impossible for three weeks but a local farmer took him in. On his return to New Waterford, the family gathered to hear his transformation to trilingualism. And they were well rewarded, if quite nonplussed. Grandfather was indeed substantially trilingual. He now spoke Russian, Yiddish – and very passable Gaelic! When they told him what he had learned wasn't English, he shrugged and set out again – to become multilingual!

I have always loved that story because it conjures up images of the Old World while grounding us firmly in the new. It also demonstrated my grandfather's courage; a characteristic all new immigrants share. It was the desire to acknowledge such courage and to honour our immigrants that first brought me to the Pier 21 Society and to finally pay tribute to the immigrant population.

For the past few years, my involvement with Pier 21 has been a challenge and a dream come true – and my passion for Pier 21 remains unabated as I see and hear the impact on the visitors – not only Canadian but international visitors as well.

Since its re-opening hundreds of thousands of visitors from Canada and around the world have walked through its doors, including royalty, world leaders, politicians and celebrities. But the majority are everyday Canadians making a personal pilgrimage – trying to recapture a moment years ago when they began a new life or attempting to learn more about a story told to them over and over again by parents or grandparents. It is an emotional journey. But more than that, it is the story of Canada.

Joe Schlesinger, a journalist, member of the Order of Canada, Pier 21 alumnus and a supporter of the pier, came to Canada as a refugee. "Forty-five years later, for me, Canada is a refuge still," he said.

I have so many favourite moments and cherished memories of Pier 21 visitors, but one has taken on particular prominence. In 1998, CBC partnered with Pier 21 and hosted a press conference in Toronto, where I spoke about our plans for the museum. The article in the Toronto paper the next morning prompted a phone call from the late Herman Newman, who arrived on Canadian shores as an orphan at age 18. After surviving Auschwitz, he was resettled in a Jewish home in Canada. He said, "Ruth, I just read about what you are doing with Pier 21, and I wanted to tell you that every year in November I return to Halifax where I spend about an hour standing in front of the Pier 21 shed while I say, 'Thank you God, thank you Canada, and thank you Pier 21.'"

I responded, "I hope you will be here on July 1, 1999, when the doors of Pier 21 will reopen."

He said, "Only death would keep me away." Tragically, Herman died before we opened, but his wife and son visited and we had a tearful but meaningful time together.

Stories like this impress upon me how important it is to record, retain and celebrate our heritage, and the courage of those who chose Canada. Every story adds to the fabric of our country and adds to the recorded history of Canadian immigration. Preserved, the history of immigration can come alive again for our children, grandchildren and their children.

One of the most moving letters I've received was from Rev. Karen E. Toole, who wrote an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press about Pier 21 in 2001. When I spoke to Rev. Toole to thank her for her remarkable letter, she told me that her editorial had resulted in more letters to the editor than they had ever received before… her words had struck a note in so many Canadian hearts.

This is an excerpt from her letter: "On my last day of a visit to reconnect with friends in the Maritimes, I took their advice and visited Pier 21. Twelve years ago, when I last visited Halifax, Pier 21 was a huge, locked-up-tight, abandoned immigration shed on the Halifax waterfront. Today, it is a museum.

"I went with a museum mentality and left with my heart wrung out with the pain and joy, the laughter and the tears, the lost and the found of it all… As I wandered through the various displays and creations offered at Pier 21, I became increasingly aware of what an incredible resource and treasure this country is to all of us.

"Every one of us, as people of Canada should have to visit this place. It should be put on our required list in order to be a citizen."

There is not a day when connections are not made at Pier 21. And to quote Montreal's La Presse's story about Pier 21's opening, "The only thing missing from Pier 21 is a large box of Kleenex."

The educational value of Pier 21 is enormous. We had no idea of the impact the Charles and Andrea Bronfman In-Transit Theatre would have on the thousands of students and adults who come to see this unique multimedia production. Our visitors can often be heard discussing the poignant stories of those who entered Canada through Pier 21 as they leave the theatre.

Although they are a fairly common occurrence, I am always incredibly humbled by the very human power of this seemingly simple waterfront shed. I think one of the most memorable days for me was when I escorted three Jewish gentlemen to our resource centre.

One man was looking for information about his grandfather. He told me that his father had died recently but had not wished to talk about his own father's past in Europe because it was so painful and he did not want to burden his children. The only information our visitor could give us was his grandfather's name. On the first try, our staff found nothing on our computer, but after trying several spelling variations, the grandfather's name (for whom our visitor had been named) appeared on the computer screen. When he saw the passenger manifest and realized that his grandfather had crossed the ocean alone, with only six dollars in his pocket, he fell to his knees in tears.

Now he had something tangible to pass on to his family. His grandfather's story would not be lost. Just as I had listened to the tale of that first snowfall in Cape Breton, his great-grandchildren would hear the story of how their ancestor arrived and created a new life in a new country. That is why Pier 21 is important and why my work continues.

Despite our great success, there is still work to be done. We have established the Pier 21 Foundation to reach across our nation and create an Endowment for Pier 21 to guarantee its future and preserve it in perpetuity. Through the generous support of our Nation Builders campaign, an endowment fund goal of $7 million will enable the foundation to continue to bring Canada's immigration story to the world. The journey continues!

If you would like to share your memories of Pier 21, please contact me at foundation@pier21.ca or visit the website at www.pier21.ca.

'Their appreciation was undiluted and unshakable'

Excerpts from an address by Rosalie Silberman Abella, then justice of the Court of Appeal for Ontario, to the Pier 21 opening luncheon, June 30, 1999, in Halifax.

The history of Canada has many textures – it is a story of discovery, of collaboration, of creativity, of independence, of tenacity and of space. It is, at the same time, a story of contradiction, insecurities, tensions, fears, inhibitions, and resistance. This country constantly recreated itself, responding to needs created by temperamental economies, colonial imperatives, linguistic chess games, geographic expanse and regional insularity. The result, though still a work in progress, is nonetheless a magnificent achievement. But it could not have been done without the Canadian people, all of whom, with the exception of the aboriginal population, were immigrants. And so the story of Canada is the story of immigrants, and Pier 21 is their proud celebratory symbol.

This story is not without its complications: this evolving country was not always comfortable with cultural departures from the traditional English-French axis. In 1928, the year Pier 21 opened, an editorial in the Toronto Globe said, "The country cannot go on if its national life is made up of races which fall short of the national standard." And, in the same year, the Dominions office, in a confidential memo, warned the British prime minister that Canada was fast losing its Anglo-Saxon character, that it was allowing in too many foreigners and was, therefore, no longer an appealing home for British immigrants.

Within three years, this fear of diversity joined forces with the Depression to persuade Canada to slam shut the country's doors to all but British or American farmers with money, doors Canada had intermittently kept open since 1900 for five million immigrants in order to feed the hearty appetite of the land and the labour market.

With few exceptions, the doors remained locked for almost two decades. And a country preoccupied with a depression and a war, would not allow itself to be distracted by the despairing cries from Europe. But at last, in 1948, once again comfortable in its economic and political skin, Canada threw open its doors to offer itself as a second chance at life for millions of immigrants.

Canada's ambivalence towards differences it could not understand and was not sure it could absorb is the discordant thread in Canada's textured history. Understandably attached to its traditions, Canada did not always appreciate that tradition is a movable feast; understandably attached to its homogeneity, it did not always appreciate that conformist homogeneity is the enemy of vibrant harmony; understandably attached to assimilation, it did not always appreciate that an assimilated community is a rebuke to those who seek an integrated entry respectful of their difference; and understandably attached to an identify it knew, it did not always appreciate that to honour your past is not to insult your newly adopted identity. A melting pot if necessary, but not necessarily a melting pot.

There is a poignant irony to this historic ambivalence towards immigrant waves of pluralism – waves of new Canadians which always proved with time to leave no disruptive fissures on our shores – and the irony is this: immigrants had no such ambivalence. Their appreciation was undiluted and unshakable. Theirs was a transforming optimism, turning an uncertain past into a passionate commitment to the country that gave their hopes a home, and turning uncertain Canadians into welcoming humanitarians who embraced the commitment and the hopes.

And this, for me, is why this pier represents Canada, because Pier 21 is a symbol of what this country is made of: the people it admitted, what those people did with their admission, and how the rest of the country made room for them.

Every immigrant who landed at Pier 21 has two stories – the story they came from and the story they started when they landed in Canada. The ships that brought them here carried memories that clung to their souls. A multitude of identities and aspirations and dreams – and nightmares – landed here with the immigrants, who unloaded their past and their fears, tied them with relief into the lightest package possible to avoid being weighed down by emotional baggage on their journey into the future, and set out to do their best to vindicate Canada's decision to grant them entry.

But notwithstanding the complex diversity of the feelings and people received by this pier, there was one thought attached to every single immigrant who set foot here: gratitude. And to understand that feeling, you have to understand the stories they come to the pier with. Here is such a story.

Of the 500,000 immigrants to land at this pier after the war, 100,000 were displaced persons and refugees. I was one of them. My parents married in Poland the day World War II started. They spent four years in a concentration camp. Their two-year-old son and my father's entire family were killed at Treblinka. They ended up in Stuttgart, Germany, after the war where my father, a lawyer, was the legal counsel for displaced persons in southwest Germany. In 1946, shortly after they were liberated, my parents had a child, then, two years later, another. It was their way of proving to the world – and themselves – that their spirit was not broken.

After years of trying to get into Canada, we finally got permission. In May of 1950, my parents, my grandmother, my younger sister and I found ourselves on an American troop ship, the General Heitzelman, headed for Halifax.

We landed at Pier 21, immediately got on what my mother remembers as a soot-filled train headed for Toronto, and started our lives all over again.

'I will never forget how lucky we were'

Within days of arriving in Toronto, my father went to the Law Society of Upper Canada to ask what tests he would need to take to become a lawyer. None, they said. Non-citizens could not be lawyers. Waiting the five years it took in those days to become a citizen was impossible. There was a family to feed. So he became an insurance agent for the next 20 years. Happily.

The moment I heard that story as a child, about my father not being able to be a lawyer, was the moment I decided to become one. But growing up, people told me that girls were not lawyers. Not so, said my parents. This is Canada. With hard work, anything is possible.

Those of us who were permitted to come to Canada were given a precious gift – the possibility of endless possibilities, and the freedom to pursue them in safety and security. That is why every immigrant who started at Pier 21 cherishes this country and its people.

My father died a month before I finished law school, and never lived to see his inspiration take flight in the daughter he raised to fear only injustice, indifference and cowardice, or in his two grandsons, one of whom has just finished law school and the other who is about to start. But he knew somehow it would turn out all right for his family because he was confident in Canada's generosity.

And how generous it has been! The child my parents had to rebuild their hearts in Germany in 1946 became a judge in Canada in 1976. Remarkable.

July 1, the day Pier 21 officially opens, is Canada Day. It is also my birthday. I cannot imagine a better birthday present then this chance to come back and say "Thank you" to the Pier I last saw as a four-year-old Jewish refugee, and to the country that took it from there.

This country is full of tenaciously grateful immigrants and their descendants who bloomed in Canada's field of opportunities, nourished by its generosity and strengthened by its idealism. This triumphal triumvirate of opportunity, generosity and idealism is what this pier stands for – Canada's best self. It is the Canada that let us in, the Canada that took one generation's European horror story and turned it into another generation's Canadian fairy tale.

I will never forget how lucky we were to be able to come to Canada, but I will also never forget why we came. These are the two stories which complete me – one joyful and one painful – and which merge in the next generation into a mother's irrevocable gratitude to a country which has made it possible for her children to have only one story – the joyful story, the Canadian story, the story that started at Pier 21.

A toast to this historic monument to Canada's humanity – its tolerance, its compassion and its freedoms. To the people who landed here and put their trust in this glorious country; to the people of Halifax who dried their tears; and to the country which encouraged their dreams and made so many of them come true.

To Pier 21 and to Canada. May they both always make us as proud as we feel today.

The major demographic challenges facing Canadian Jewry

By CHARLES SHAHAR

This article will examine the major demographic challenges facing Canada's Jewish population in the next two decades. Most of the following information is derived from 2001 census data. As the chief researcher involved in the Jewish community's National Census Analysis, I feel I am in a unique position to describe some of the major findings and implications arising from this investigation.

Certain challenges are not described below, simply because the census does not provide information related to them. For instance, it is widely recognized that Jews have relatively low birth rates, likely under replacement levels. However, there is no question in the latest census that deals with the issue of fertility. Neither does the census provide vital statistics related to marriage, divorce or mortality.

The major challenges facing Canadian Jewry are not addressed in order of importance or priority. Some issues have a higher level of immediacy, whereas others will become more critical over time. Each issue can be the subject of a much more extensive treatment, but the nature of this medium permits only a brief consideration instead.

Dependency ratios and vulnerable populations

Using age breakdowns, it's possible to calculate the dependency ratio for a particular population. The dependency ratio is the proportion of children (zero to 14 years) and seniors (65 and older) relative to economically productive adults (15 to 64 years). The higher the dependency ratio of a population, the fewer the people in their wage-earning years to support children and non-working seniors.

According to the 2001 census, the dependency ratio for the national Jewish community is 0.56. In comparison, the dependency ratio for the overall Canadian population is 0.46, somewhat lower than that of Canada's Jewish population.

Dependency ratios become more striking as one examines the rates in individual communities. For instance, the dependency rate for the Montreal Jewish community is 0.70. It is 0.64 for the Winnipeg Jewish community, 0.54 for the Toronto Jewish community, and 0.42 for the Vancouver Jewish community.

In short, compared to other communities, the dependency ratios for the Jewish populations of Montreal and Winnipeg are rather high, suggesting the burden of looking after their economically dependent members is more pronounced than in other major Jewish communities across Canada. This has implications for the economic viability of the Montreal and Winnipeg communities and their long-term ability to provide services and programs for their more vulnerable members.

The size of the Jewish labour force

Related to the issue of dependency ratios is the size of the Jewish labour force. An examination of the age distribution of Canada's Jews shows that the 25- to 44-year-old cohort has decreased significantly in size, from 110,125 to 90,510 individuals from 1991 to 2001. Whereas this cohort comprises 24.4 per cent of the age distribution of the Jewish population, it represents 30.5 per cent of the total Canadian population.

The Jewish community has the lowest proportion of individuals aged 25 to 44 years of any ethnic group in the country. The Vietnamese (38.5 per cent), Filipino (34.8 per cent) and Latin American (34.7 per cent) communities have the highest proportions in this age group. These latter communities have been getting "new blood" and renewing themselves through vigorous immigration over the last two decades.

The trend of a diminishing labour force in the Jewish community has implications for our demographic continuity, and for the economic clout we will exercise in the future. It also has implications for our ability to draw upon a future pool of leaders, and to adequately fund our community programs and services, and therefore, to support our more vulnerable members.

Issues related to demographic continuity are also relevant when one examines the median age of the Jewish population in this country. It's clear that the median age of Jews has been steadily increasing. It was 33.6 years in 1971, 34.6 years in 1981, 37.3 years in 1991 and 40.2 years in 2001.

National comparisons between ethnic communities reveal that groups with newer waves of immigrants have median ages that are well below those of "older" communities (Figure 1). For instance, median ages for newer communities include African (25.2 years), Pakistani (25.4 years), Latin American (27.2 years), Arab (28.4 years), and Caribbean (29.4 years).

The median ages for older communities include British (44 years), Jewish (40.2 years), French (39.5 years), Polish (37.3 years), and German (37 years). These are mostly ethnic groups whose periods of peak immigration lie in the past, and which are experiencing little natural growth by way of fertility.

A breakdown of median age by individual Jewish communities is also instructive. The "oldest" Jewish populations in the country include St. Catharine's/Niagara (48.4 years), Windsor (45.9 years), Winnipeg (44.5 years) and Edmonton (42.3 years). These communities have large proportions of elderly members, and some are also seeing significant outmigration of Jewish youth.

The "youngest" Jewish populations include those in Calgary (37.2 years), London (37.8 years), Toronto (39.4 years) and Ottawa (39.7 years). As will be noted in later sections, these communities are experiencing an influx of Jews from other areas of the country, as well as immigrants from outside Canada, and are thus being replenished in numbers.

Note: Only the five groups with the lowest and highest median ages are included in this chart

The wave of baby boomers

An analysis of projected counts of Jewish elderly in Canada for the years 2011 and 2021 has revealed some interesting demographic scenarios in the coming years. These projections are based on "survival rates" of 10-year cohorts between 1991 and 2001, and they assume that the same conditions that applied in the past decade will extend to the next 20 years.

This assumption may or may not turn out to be correct. For instance, seniors are living longer due to advancements in medical technology and improved home-care services. There may also be different migration patterns of elderly to and from Canada in the future. These projections should therefore be considered only as general or "best guess" estimates.

In general terms, the total population of Canada's Jewish seniors will continue to increase in size, and in a very dramatic fashion by the year 2021 (Figure 2). In 2001, there were 61,865 Jewish elderly in Canada. This total is projected to increase to 65,819 by 2011. However, as the baby boomers swell the ranks of the elderly, the number of Jewish seniors is projected to explode to 90,961 people by 2021.

This points to a fundamental change in the demographic structure of the Jewish population in this country and has important ramifications for service planning and resource allocation for Jewish communities across Canada.

For instance, the Toronto metropolitan area had 27,495 Jewish seniors in 2001. The number of elderly is predicted to increase to 30,852 individuals by 2011 and 45,517 by 2021. This latter increase is staggering, and has profound implications for the demographic makeup of the Toronto Jewish community, and for the challenges it represents to community-based services.

The Jewish elderly population in the Vancouver census metropolitan area (CMA) will continue to increase in size. In 2001, there were 2,970 Jewish seniors there. This total is projected to grow to 4,226 individuals by 2011, and to 7,375 by 2021. The latter increase is striking, and will represent significant challenges as demands for services increase as well. Projections likewise reveal noteworthy increases in the numbers of Jewish elderly in Ottawa, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton, and Victoria by the year 2021.

Jewish migration: the ebb and flow of populations

It is noteworthy that of 27 major Jewish communities in Canada (with populations of at least 250 Jews), 11 have shown population declines between 1991 and 2001. In percentage terms, the largest declines in Jewish populations have taken place in Saskatoon (-42 per cent), Fredericton (-29.3 per cent), London (-15 per cent), Regina (-15 per cent), and Windsor (-14.6 per cent).

In Atlantic Canada, four of five major Jewish centres have diminished in size between 1991 and 2001, with only the Halifax Jewish population gaining in numbers. This has had a major impact on the Atlantic communities in question. For instance, synagogues have been closed or downsized in communities such as Yarmouth, N.S., and St. John's. Even in Halifax, the challenge has been to keep young people from moving to larger communities in the rest of Canada.

The 2001 census asked respondents where they were living five years prior to enumeration. It is therefore possible to track mobility patterns of Jews across Canada between 1996 and 2001. Note that in the description below, immigration from outside Canada is not taken into consideration, only Jewish migration within this country.

When it comes to the ebb and flow of Jewish migration, the Toronto metropolitan area is clearly a magnet for Jews from across the country. A total of 5,610 Jews migrated to Toronto from the rest of Canada, and 3,300 left Toronto for the rest of the country, for a net gain of 2,310 individuals from 1996 to 2001. The largest influx came from Montreal, followed by the rest of Ontario and Vancouver.

The Calgary Jewish population gained 920 and lost 605 individuals, for a net gain of 315 persons between 1996-2001. The largest gains came from the rest of Alberta, as well as Toronto and Montreal. Ottawa experienced a gain of 1,325 and a loss of 1,010 individuals, for a net gain of 315 persons. The majority moved to the nation's capital from Montreal and the rest of Ontario.

Interestingly, the greater Vancouver Jewish community experienced a loss of 1,630 individuals and a gain of 1,590 individuals, for a small net loss of 40 people to other parts of Canada. The major losses were to Toronto and the rest of British Columbia. It's clear that the migrations of Jews to Vancouver from the rest of the country have diminished significantly since their greatest period of intensity in the 1970's and 1980's.

Montreal had a loss of 3,875 individuals between 1996 and 2001. However, 1,645 Jews also moved here from other places in Canada. On the other hand, 50 per cent of the individuals lost to the rest of the country were between 25 and 44 years of age. Both from the perspectives of demographic and economic continuity, the issue of youth retention clearly remains an important one for Montreal's Jewish community.

Of 8,030 individuals born in the FSU who came from Israel to Canada between 1996-2001:

- 64.9 per cent identified themselves as Jews;
- 16.8 per cent had no religious affiliation and did not consider themselves as Jewish ethnically;
- 18.2 per cent said they had another religion, such as Russian Orthodox.

In short, 35 per cent did not consider themselves to be Jews, at least according to the criteria employed by the census analysis. Some of these people who did not identify as Jewish likely have very tenuous connections to Judaism. In some cases, they are the spouses of Jews who have intermarried.

The findings also revealed important regional differences in the identification patterns of FSU individuals who came from Israel after 1996. For instance, a higher percentage in Toronto identified themselves as Jews (73.1 per cent), compared to those living in the Vancouver area (54.5 per cent) or Montreal (40 per cent).

It's not clear why a higher percentage of Toronto's FSU immigrants identified themselves as Jews. But this comparison suggests that the Montreal and Vancouver Jewish communities have particular challenges ahead in terms of integrating these immigrants from the FSU and making them feel part of the fold.

The persistence of Jewish poverty

How to deal with the issue of poverty has been at the forefront of the Jewish communal agenda for many decades, particularly in the larger communities with significant numbers of poor. Jewish federations across the country have implemented a number of programs and initiatives that have sought to alleviate the hardships that many Jews experience as a result of their economic disadvantage.

There are 49,525 Jews living below the poverty line in Canada, comprising 13.4 per cent of 369,565 members of the Jewish population in this country. In other words, more than one in eight Jews in Canada are economically disadvantaged.

The census found that the highest levels of poverty are experienced by the following three groups: Jews between 55 and 64 years relying on social assistance or worker's compensation (65.7 per cent); female Jewish seniors 75 and older who are living alone (48.5 per cent); and Jewish children less than five years old living in female-led single parent families (48 per cent).

There are significant regional differences as far as Jewish poverty is concerned. The largest number of disadvantaged Jews are located in the Toronto area (19,745), which is home to 40 per cent of the total 49,525 Jewish poor in Canada.

The Montreal area has 17,110 Jews living below the poverty line. Although Montreal has almost as many Jewish poor as Toronto, it has a significantly smaller Jewish population. The burgeoning numbers of poor in Montreal thus represent a significant strain on the resources of that community.

The Vancouver area has 3,150 Jewish poor, or 6.4 per cent of the total Jewish poor in Canada. There are also significant contingents of disadvantaged Jews in Winnipeg (1,83)), Ottawa (1,320), and Calgary (815).

Immigrants from FSU have had a profound impact

The phenomenon of "Jewish sprawl"

The term "Jewish sprawl" has been coined to describe the phenomenon of Jews settling away from typically Jewish neighbourhoods, mostly living on the fringes of community life, far away from Jewish schools, synagogues and other services. Sometimes, younger families or immigrants move into areas that provide more affordable housing. It then becomes a challenge for local Jewish communities to outreach to these individuals and keep them connected.

All the major Jewish communities in Canada have seen rising Jewish populations at the fringes of their communities. Winnipeg is a good example. The census reveals that Jews in Winnipeg continue to move into districts that have not traditionally been considered Jewish neighbourhoods, and where Jews form only small minorities relative to the total population.

For example, the Jewish population in these "fringe" areas of Winnipeg increased by 575 people, or 28.3 per cent, between 1991 and 2001. This comprised a third of all the increases experienced in Winnipeg by nine of 14 districts showing population growth in that decade.

What does this mean? The Winnipeg community is now more spread out than ever before. This dispersion creates challenges for service delivery. For example, the Jewish school bus can't reach some of the children who need busing because they live in neighbourhoods that don't have significant numbers of Jewish children. Some parents may, therefore, send their children to public schools instead (although the choice to live in these neighbourhoods may have already been a choice not to use the available day school or Hebrew bilingual program).

In terms of the national picture, an examination of areas with the highest percentage increases between 1991 and 2001 shows that Aurora in the Toronto area had the highest "relative" gain in Jewish population (+164.1 per cent). Other large percentage increases included: Maple Ridge/Pitt Meadows/ Langley in greater Vancouver (+103 per cent), Kanata/Residual West in Ottawa (+96.9 per cent), Port Coquitlam/Coquitlam/Port Moody in greater Vancouver (+92.6 per cent), and Newmarket (+80.5 per cent) and Oakville (+67.3 per cent) in greater Toronto (see Table 1).

As budding Jewish populations, these areas represent major challenges for local Jewish federations, who often struggle to respond to the needs of "satellite" communities. Jewish sprawl also has implications for fundraising, since these communities represent a potential pool of donors. Yet, unless stronger links are fostered, the financial support of those who live on the "outskirts" of community life cannot be counted upon.

The Integration of Immigrants

The recent wave of immigrants from the former Soviet Union (FSU) has had a profound impact on Jewish demographics in this country. In fact, it represents the largest Jewish immigrant influx from a single country or region to Canada since the flood of eastern European refugees in the early part of the 1900's.

The recent arrival of immigrants born in the FSU has contributed significant increases to the Jewish populations of Toronto, Vancouver, Calgary, and Ottawa. There have also been major influxes to Canada of Jews from South Africa and Latin America in the last decade, and even more recently, Jews from France have settled in Montreal.

How well are these immigrants integrating into community life? Unfortunately, the census does not provide information related to Jewish communal affiliation. However, some indirect indices have shed light on the identification patterns of recent immigrants, specifically from the FSU.

For instance, the author performed an analysis that looked at the identification patterns of individuals born in the FSU who came from Israel in the five years preceding the census (1996 to 2001). Using the census, it was possible to determine whether such individuals identified themselves as Jews by religion and/or ethnicity.

Of 8,030 individuals born in the FSU who came from Israel to Canada between 1996-2001:

- 64.9 per cent identified themselves as Jews;
- 16.8 per cent had no religious affiliation and did not consider themselves as Jewish ethnically;
- 18.2 per cent said they had another religion, such as Russian Orthodox.

In short, 35 per cent did not consider themselves to be Jews, at least according to the criteria employed by the census analysis. Some of these people who did not identify as Jewish likely have very tenuous connections to Judaism. In some cases, they are the spouses of Jews who have intermarried.

The findings also revealed important regional differences in the identification patterns of FSU individuals who came from Israel after 1996. For instance, a higher percentage in Toronto identified themselves as Jews (73.1 per cent), compared to those living in the Vancouver area (54.5 per cent) or Montreal (40 per cent).

It's not clear why a higher percentage of Toronto's FSU immigrants identified themselves as Jews. But this comparison suggests that the Montreal and Vancouver Jewish communities have particular challenges ahead in terms of integrating these immigrants from the FSU and making them feel part of the fold.

The persistence of Jewish poverty

How to deal with the issue of poverty has been at the forefront of the Jewish communal agenda for many decades, particularly in the larger communities with significant numbers of poor. Jewish federations across the country have implemented a number of programs and initiatives that have sought to alleviate the hardships that many Jews experience as a result of their economic disadvantage.

There are 49,525 Jews living below the poverty line in Canada, comprising 13.4 per cent of 369,565 members of the Jewish population in this country. In other words, more than one in eight Jews in Canada are economically disadvantaged.

The census found that the highest levels of poverty are experienced by the following three groups: Jews between 55 and 64 years relying on social assistance or worker's compensation (65.7 per cent); female Jewish seniors 75 and older who are living alone (48.5 per cent); and Jewish children less than five years old living in female-led single parent families (48 per cent).

There are significant regional differences as far as Jewish poverty is concerned. The largest number of disadvantaged Jews are located in the Toronto area (19,745), which is home to 40 per cent of the total 49,525 Jewish poor in Canada.

The Montreal area has 17,110 Jews living below the poverty line. Although Montreal has almost as many Jewish poor as Toronto, it has a significantly smaller Jewish population. The burgeoning numbers of poor in Montreal thus represent a significant strain on the resources of that community.

The Vancouver area has 3,150 Jewish poor, or 6.4 per cent of the total Jewish poor in Canada. There are also significant contingents of disadvantaged Jews in Winnipeg (1,83)), Ottawa (1,320), and Calgary (815).

All in all, the issue of Jewish poverty is a complex one. Poverty has its roots in familial breakdown, limited educational or training opportunities, government policies, and a vicious cycle of negative self-perceptions. Poverty leads to social stigma, isolation from the community and a general loss of self-esteem.

Poverty cannot be solved or eliminated by Jewish communities in isolation. The key will be partnerships, government advocacy and an ongoing political and communal will to tackle the difficult issues involved. Poverty remains one of the most intractable challenges facing Jewish communities today.

Intermarriage and Jewish continuity

The census can be used to analyze the incidence of intermarriage in the Jewish population. In the national community, there are 58,235 Jews who live in intermarried arrangements. This represents 20.7 per cent of all individuals living in couple arrangements, and 15.7 per cent of the total population of Jews in this country.

How does this 2001 level of intermarriage compare to statistics available from the previous decade? In 1991, about 46,000 Jews were living in such arrangements, meaning there was an increase of more than a quarter in the subsequent decade. In short, there has been a significant increase in the number of individuals who live in intermarried households, and this trend will likely continue.

A recent study titled Jewish Life in Greater Toronto: a Survey of the Attitudes & Behaviours of Greater Toronto's Jewish Community (September 2005) found that when it comes to ritual adherence, the intermarried scored the lowest of any segment of the community . They also scored among the lowest on measures of organizational affiliation, children in Jewish day schools and closeness to Israel.

The study further found that intermarriage has implications across generational lines. Only 29.7 per cent of intermarried couples were bringing up their children strictly as Jews (Figure 3). Intermarried Jews were also much more likely to have children who themselves intermarry. The report concluded that intermarriage is "the single most serious threat to Jewish continuity, and the largest impetus for assimilation."

In short, as the level of intermarriage keeps rising, the impact on Jewish continuity is profound. The challenge for local communities is to provide intermarried families with an opportunity to participate in communal life by helping these couples feel more accepted, and by introducing their children to various aspects of Jewish tradition. The findings of the Toronto study strongly suggest that there are long-term implications if such families feel alienated and "fall though the cracks."

Final thoughts

The face of Canadian Jewry is constantly changing. Jewish leaders and planners must understand these developments if they are to deal with their implications. Such changes may call for a significant re-evaluation of how Jewish communities respond to the needs of their members, and how resources are allocated within and across communities. The priorities we choose to focus on will likely shape our destiny as a community for years to come.

Charles Shahar is the chief researcher of the National Jewish Demographic Study, involving data derived from the 2001 federal census. He has written extensive reports for individual Jewish communities as well as the national population along several themes (basic demographics, geographic distribution, the elderly, Jewish poverty, Jewish immigration, intermarriage, etc.). He has been research co-ordinator in the community planning department of FEDERATION CJA in Montreal for the past 16 years.

Note: The National Census Analysis is sponsored by UIA Federations Canada. All census figures cited were derived from special order tabulations obtained from Statistics Canada.

Abraham (Abe) Lieff

An oral history: a centenarian looks back on Canadian Jewry

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

For more than a century, Abraham (Abe) Lieff, who is known as the father of modern Canadian family law, has witnessed history unfolding in Canada and Israel.

Lieff is a walking history book. His memory reaches back into the pioneer days of the development of the organized Jewish community in Canada, particularly the Jewish community in Ottawa.

At age 102, the former justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario, who was the first Jew to hold this position, has an astonishing memory for names, events and dates. He was the first Jew to take the oath of office holding a Jerusalem Bible, and the first to wear a kippah during the ceremony.

Lieff has racked up many other firsts in his eventful life, often breaking through barriers. He was first Jew to serve as the head of non-sectarian organizations, serving as the president of the Ottawa Kiwanis Club, and the first Jewish member of the board of the Catholic St. Vincent's Hospital.

Interviewed at Toronto's Forest Hill Place retirement residence, he displays some nine volumes of his autobiographical memoirs, titled Gathering Rosebuds, of family, his career in law, his love of music and his activities in education, politics and religious life.

Several years ago, his personal collection of photographs and memorabilia was donated to the Ottawa Jewish Archives. He lived and practised law in Ottawa until he became a superior court judge in 1963.

To demonstrate the high esteem his colleagues hold for him, the Supreme Court (now the Superior Court of Ontario) celebrated his 100th birthday at a wine and cheese reception held in the Lieff Room, hosted by former colleagues of both the High Court and members of the Court of Appeal.

To celebrate his lifelong commitment to Judaism, at age 100, a sefer Torah was commissioned in honour of the centenarian by his close friend Joseph Kerzner. It was donated to Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation, where Lieff is a member and a regular attendee. Special celebrations, siyum haTorah, were held in his honour at the synagogue to mark his 100th year.

The Lieff Torah has been taken to Camp Ramah for the summer for the camp's religious services. Lieff, a supporter of camping, attends special Monday services at Camp Ramah in which he participates in the services, makes an aliyah and addresses the campers. In his speeches, the soft-spoken and charismatic Lieff often mentions religious writings and stories of his early years.

Lieff was raised, in poverty, in an Orthodox home during the Depression and he had to struggle for an education.

His parents came from a Polish shtetl called Antopol, in what is now known as Belarus. Esther Malca Pomerantz and Bernard Lifshitz gave birth to their first son Avraham Chaim (Abraham) on March 5, 1903.

Lieff's father fled the Polish village that year and came to Canada. Lieff arrived two years later, with his mother, when he was two years old. Lieff was one of seven children. The family settled in Ottawa's Lower Town district.

Lieff's father worked as a peddler and later, trying to avoid working on the Sabbath, he became a Hebrew teacher. Lieff was taught Torah and Psalms from an early age, as most young Jewish boys were at the turn of the century. His early exposure to religious texts had a lasting influence on him throughout his life and permeated his personal life and his career in law. When he spoke to other lawyers and clients, he often told lessons from the Bible.

As a young boy, Lieff worked as a newsboy, bellhop and soda jerk. He played the banjo and was an extra in various productions at Ottawa's old Russell Theatre. He played guitar at his high school dances.

"In 1916, my brother and I sold newspapers in downtown Ottawa. The newspaper came out at noon. It carried lists of our war casualties and people bought the paper as it was pre-radio and pre-TV. Many people didn't even have phones and the few who did, had a party line. If we needed a phone, we went to the corner grocery store to use the phone, as we were regular customers," Lieff says.

He worked for the telegraph company when he was a teenager. "I delivered a telegram to the home of Sir Wilfred Laurier, prime minister of Canada. He invited me in for coffee and cake. We had a nice talk and I received a tip," he says.

"In 1917, when I was 14, I attended the Balfour Declaration celebrations in Ottawa. It was a parade of Ottawa Jews. We marched to a hall where the community held a very joyful dance and celebration."

As a teenager, Lieff was affiliated with the Ottawa Maccabean Circle, a co-ed youth group, and also with the YMHA.

He attended Ottawa Collegiate Institute and was called to the bar at Toronto's Osgoode Hall Law School in 1926. While studying at Osgoode, Lieff served as a leader of a Young Judea Group, which met at the Zionist Institute at Cecil and Beverly streets.

"Some of my boys at Young Judea were Sam Godfrid, Louis Rasminsky, Lewis Cohen, Harold Taube, Ben Manson, Harry and Al Pasternak, Eddie Leranbaum and many others." Lieff adds that they became well-known in the Jewish community. Lieff became the president of the Ottawa Young Judea in 1927.

While studying in Toronto at Osgoode Hall, he also taught at the Holy Blossom Temple. "I had to earn money in order to go to school," he says.

He met his wife, Sadie Lazarovitz, at a Young Judea conference in Ottawa in 1925, when they were both in law school. They were married in 1929.

Sadie was from Quebec City. She graduated from McGill Law School and became a member of the bar in Nova Scotia.

"When Sadie graduated from law school, women couldn't be called to the bar in Quebec, so she went to Nova Scotia to get her licence," Lieff said.

Lieff's first appointment as a law student was with Benjamin Goldfield, Ottawa's first and at that time, only Jewish lawyer. Lieff notes that in the 1920s, law firms did not hire Jewish law students.

"I did not get paid the first year with Goldfield and [got] $10 a month during the second year until I was called to the bar. After the establishment of the State of Israel," he says, "then law firms became more acceptable of Jewish professionals."

His first involvement in community was when he was still a law student. "In 1921, Goldfield was involved in the Keren Hayesod – forerunner to the UJA." He credits the early Canadian community's involvement in Zionist activities to Archibald Jacob Freiman, who served as president of the Zionist Organization of Canada from the early 1920s until his death in 1944.

"I would accompany Goldfield to meetings and one day we met Meyer Vechesler, a part-time writer with a local paper. He was covering the Zionist Organization's 1921 fundraising campaign, which was held in Ottawa because the president lived there," he says.

Lieff recalls that he went along with Vechesler for an interview with Lt.-Col. John Henry Patterson, who was the guest speaker at the fundraiser.

Patterson fought under Gen. George Allenby and was a well-known Zionist supporter. "When we got to Patterson's room at the Chateau Laurier, where I had worked as a bellhop, Patterson found out that we were both novice reporters.

"He told us that he had just spoken in Montreal and he could give us some of the clippings from the Montreal papers. Those clippings helped us a lot to write the story. Later, I handled the newspaper publicity for the first Keren Hayesod campaigns in Ottawa. That was my first job with the Zionist Organization," Lieff says.

As he became more involved with the Zionist Organization, he was sent to speak at synagogues to raise money for Israel. "I met many important Zionists when they came to speak in Ottawa and to raise funds – [Ze'ev] Jabotinski, [Chaim] Weizmann, Menachem Mendel Ussishkin, and many others."

In the late 1920s, he became involved with the Liberal Party of Canada. In 1929, Prime Minister Mackenzie King was asked to speak to a group of young people in Ottawa for the Liberal Party. King stipulated that he would come only if the committee announced the formation of a national Young Liberal Association, which later became the Twentieth Century Liberal Association.

In those days, Lieff says, men and women had separate groups. Both he and his wife became active and many times, despite tradition, they worked together. Soon, Lieff was organizing speakers. He became the national secretary of the Young Liberals. Before long, there were 600 individual Liberal clubs across the country.

But most of his efforts were devoted to his West Ottawa riding. His wife unsuccessfully ran for office, but they both remained active in the Liberal Party until 1963, when he was appointed a judge in Toronto. "I wasn't involved in any politics after that."

After World War II began in 1939, many brilliant young Jewish men came to Ottawa, he notes.

Ottawa Jewish community had strong leaders

Charles Gavsie, a lawyer on the staff of the C.D. Howe Institute, became the president of the St. Lawrence Seaway and was later appointed deputy minister of the Income Tax Division.

Carl Goldenberg was a brilliant labour negotiator.

David Golden came from Winnipeg and reached a high position in the civil service.

Wilfred Gallay was a world authority on the quality of paper and rose to the position of vice-president of research of the E.B. Eddy Paper company.

"There were lots of powerful Jews in the civil service and many in the sciences in Ottawa," Lieff said.

And the Jewish community had strong leaders in Jewish communal work. Along with heading the Zionist Organization, A .J. Freiman was also the president of Adath Jeshurun (King Edward Avenue Shul) from 1904 to '44 and the president of the Va'ad Ha'ir of Ottawa from '34 to '44. Lieff served as president of the Va'ad Ha'ir for 1952 and 1953.

"There were many others, like Elias Pullan, a community leader and an early president of my parents' Orthodox Agudath Achim Synagogue in Ottawa. He later moved to Toronto, where he became a leader," Lieff says.

"It was a brilliant community and it still is. Along with their many achievements, many of these men are shul-goers and some are members of my Ottawa shul."

He notes that many things have changed in the synagogues. "Until the end of World War I, all aliyot and other Torah honours during the High Holy Days were auctioned. The two items that brought in the most money were the Maftir Yonah, read at the Minchah service on Yom Kippur, and at the opening of the Ark for Neilah, the concluding Yom Kippur service.

"I was 10 years old when I attended the dedication of my parent's Agudath Achim Synagogue on Rideau Street when they held a chanukat habayit at their shul on January 19, 1913."

In the early 1940s, Lieff led the movement to establish Ottawa's first Conservative congregation, the Agudath Israel Synagogue. He served as president for 17 years and presided at the dedication and gala dinner, which marked the opening of the new building in 1949.

Lieff in Ottawa in 1950 with the world president of the Kiwanis Club when he was the president of the Ottawa Kiwanis Club, the first Jew to hold the position.

"Our synagogue hired Rabbi Morris Margolis, the first full-time rabbi to serve in Ottawa. He was an outstanding rabbi. Before that, each rabbi would serve several congregations," Lieff says..

"In Toronto, we also have outstanding community leaders and a fine combination of synagogues and able rabbis.

"We have a Board of Jewish Education headed by Seymour Epstein that has maintained very high standards. Our Hebrew day schools of various shadings – Reform, Orthodox, Conservative and yeshivot are of the highest calibre – and the Toronto Jewish community generously subsidizes day schools and education.

"Although I came from a fine Jewish community in Ottawa, it has not reached the level of Toronto, as they do not have a good Jewish high school but steps have been taken."

Although Lieff has lived in Toronto for more than four decades, it is obvious that he still has deep roots in the Ottawa community.

Lieff, left, at the opening and dedication of Agudath Israel Synagogue in February 1949, the first Conservative synagogue in Ottawa. With him holding the key, is Harry Leikin, the synagogue's founding president along with some of the synagogue's board members.

When he was appointed to the Supreme Court of Ontario, the appointment required that the Lieffs move from Ottawa to Toronto. He left his private practice and his earnings were reduced. He retired at the mandatory age of 75 and became a family law commissioner for 13 years.

He was responsible for establishing pre-trial conferences, as well as other ways to minimize conflicts and the cost of divorce.

When a new Canadian appeared before Lieff, he would ask them where they came from and regardless of where they came from, he would say, "That's quite close to where I was born." This would ease a tense situation. He became known for having a movable birthplace.

Looking back, Lieff says that the things that stand out most in his mind are "the establishment of the State of Israel – that's our people-hood. And personally, marrying Sadie Lazarovitz (who died in 1999) and having a wonderful life with her for 70 years, short a couple of months."

Lieff believes that education is the prime requisite for Jewish survival. He strongly advocates community support for all Hebrew schools in cases of proven need.

"We used to go to cheder six days a week, including the summer months. In my youth," he recalls, "it was before bar mitzvah parties in Ottawa. The whole adult approach then was, 30 days before the bar mitzvah, we went to shul to learn how to put on tfillin, a practice which would continue throughout a Jew's life. No one made much of a deal of the bar mitzvah day," he says.

After the davening on the day of the bar mitzvah, occasionally, a family might serve herring and Geneva gin – "which was not very good. Our family couldn't afford the kiddush.

"After the service, we children walked home with mother and father and had our regular superb lunch – just our family. There was no such thing as a Jewish caterer."

As a child, he says, there were no summer camps for Jewish children. "Young children worked in the summer. My first personal experience with camp was with my daughters, Miriam Tova and Lois Elizabeth. It had a great influence on them and to this day they are at shul every Shabbos. I am very happy the way my daughters practise their Yiddishkeit."

He reflects that one of the biggest developments in Toronto is the growth of the Hebrew day schools and high schools. "In my view, compared to New York and other American cities, it may even be better."

Lieff has seen many amazing changes in the Jewish community. "The peddlers' sons are building skyscrapers and new communities in many major centres. And we are blessed that our young leadership is generous and they support local and Israeli facilities.

"Without our Hebrew schools, camps and community organizations, we wouldn't have all of this."

Above all, he says, "I am proud of the young leadership coming up throughout Canada. Until five years ago, I took courses at the University of Toronto. Some of the students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto would participate in discussions with the professors. They were of a very high calibre, intelligent and very polite.

"They were a delight to me and will undoubtedly form the rising leadership of the community of Toronto and Canada."

"For all this, dayeinu."

200 agents and counting: "make life easier, and they will come"

Murray Goldkind

Sutton Group Admiral Realty has often been described as the "little company that grew." How do you attract over 200 top agents in 13 short years? By maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle, say Toronto real estate Brokers Sol & Murray Goldkind.

"What an agent wants is to sell real estate, pure and simple," says Murray. "That's what we help them do. We give them the tools they need, help when they need it, and an atmosphere that is second to none."

According to the Goldkinds, top agents are now looking for service-oriented environments without rigid structure. That means access to the latest computer facilities and a full compliment of the latest personal marketing and career management software and tools. Sutton Group Admiral uses a "fee-for-service" concept, which lets agents pick and choose the services they want. In this way there are never any hidden costs passed on to an agent, nor are agents ever penalized by waste generated by others. In other words, each agent, acting as his or her own businessperson, enjoys the benefit of controlling their bottom line.

Says Sol, "timing isn't everything, it's just 98%, and as timing goes we are both proud and confident to provide the concept that agents are looking for both now and in the future."

Quebec appeal court overturns precedent-setting get order

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Quebec Court of Appeal has overturned a precedent-setting order that a man pay damages to his ex-wife for withholding a get despite having signed an agreement to appear before a Montreal rabbinical court immediately after receiving a provisional civil divorce.

The three judges, two of whom are women, ruled unanimously that Superior Court Justice Israel Mass was wrong 2½ years ago when he decided that the defendant, Jessel (Jason) Marcovitz, entered into a contract that is civilly enforceable, despite its religious nature.

Woman was an agunah for 15 years

The higher court says the federal Divorce Act does not give courts jurisdiction to require the issuance of a get, the Jewish religious divorce, no matter what the divorcing parties have consented to, because courts don't have the right to enforce a matter of religious obligation. It also ruled that the 1990 amendment to the act requiring spouses to remove barriers to the other's religious remarriage before a civil divorce is granted was irrelevant in this case because of a legal technicality.

Marcovitz did not give a get to Stephanie Bruker until 15 years after their decree nisi, or provisional, divorce in 1980. Mass awarded $47,500 plus interest and additional indemnity going back to 1996 to Bruker for having been unable to remarry according to traditional Judaism or have legitimate children during those years. She was 31 when her civil divorce was finalized in 1981, and almost 47 when she received a get.

Israel mulls Canadian divorce amendment

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canadian law may soon be used to help ease the plight of thousands of agunot in Israel.

Following a historic meeting near Tel Aviv last month, Israel is weighing groundbreaking changes to its divorce laws modelled on Canada's amendments to the federal Divorce Act that prevent spouses from using the get as a bargaining chip to obtain concessions in civil divorce proceedings.

Meeting at Bar-Ilan University in Ramat Gan, leading Israeli legal scholars and political figures joined representatives of rabbinic and secular courts to hammer out a "very tentative" agreement to adopt the Canadian model of Jewish divorce, says a Toronto lawyer who helped draft the domestic legislation and attended the meeting.

"It's a huge, major breakthrough. If it works in Israel, this is going to proliferate around the world," said John Syrtash, an authority on the interplay between secular law and Halachah, especially as it affects family matters.

If the Canadian model is adopted in Israel, where marriage and divorce are controlled solely by the religious establishment, the plight of thousands of agunot (literally, "chained women" who are denied a religious divorce and cannot remarry Jewishly) would "dramatically" improve, Syrtash predicts.

Shofar on the Hill

Rabbis Simcha Zirkind, second from right, and Mendy Zirkind presented a ceremonial shofar to Prime Minister Paul Martin at a meeting last week that reviewed the wide-ranging humanitarian work being undertaken by Chabad Lubavitch, including relief efforts in Louisiana currently being done by Chabad emissaries. They also discussed the significance of the sounds of the shofar at this time of the year.

Rosh Hashanah Greetings

For a just society

One of S.Y. Agnon's most insightful tales, The Kilikov Trial, is also one of his shortest. In fact, it is so concise that I will reproduce it here in full before drawing on its lessons:

I have still not concluded all my praise for Kilikov, for not for its worldly qualities alone is Kilikov to be extolled, but it is to be praised for the judicial decisions of its judges. What are the decisions of its judges?

It is told that once, during the Polish wars, a gentile killed his friend in Kilikov. Maliciously or accidentally? From the judgment it emerges that he was killed with malice. He was put in jail and convicted of killing, as a man is convicted when murdering another with malice.

When the murderer was taken out to be hanged, it was remembered that he was a blacksmith by profession and that in all Kilikov there was no other blacksmith. And indeed a city cannot cope without a blacksmith, who serves the needs of many.

They investigated and found that in the city there were two tailors but that they could make do with one. The judges reconvened and said: instead of the blacksmith we shall hang one tailor and we shall let the blacksmith live, for the city cannot manage without a blacksmith but one tailor will suffice.

They acquitted the blacksmith and brought him back from the hangman's house and in his stead they hanged one of the two tailors living in the city. Which of the two I do not know, but I do know a poem that the wise man Mordechai Ben David Starlisker, known as Marbad Set, composed about it, the conclusion of which hints at its beginning: "Here there are two who are tailors/ One is put on trial and he will be punished severely/ Then shall the country see your wisdom and be fearful/ And thereafter no man shall wilfully offend."

This story was introduced to me by Dr. Shulamit Almog, who teaches law at Haifa University, who in turn was introduced to it by Justice Haim Cohen, one of the luminaries of Israeli law. According to Justice Cohen, the short tale of Kilikov encapsulates all of Agnon's wisdom regarding the complexities and ambiguities of law and justice. Although it has the feel of a period piece about prewar Europe, it contains a timeless lesson for all of us in the business of advocating for a better society.

Ed Morgan, National President, Canadian Jewish Congress

The premier of Ontario has recently announced his government's intention to withdraw legal recognition from all religiously arbitrated family law disputes. The announcement comes on the heels of a campaign by the Muslim community to bring sharia-based family law tribunals to Ontario, and a counter-campaign by Muslim women to ban the use of Islamic law in such a gender-sensitive context. The beit din, which has for many years provided family adjudications for the Orthodox sector of our community, has been sacrificed for the sake of gender equality across all sectors of society.

Creating a just society, as Agnon's characters learned in Kilikov, is indeed a complicated affair. That which the government sees as serving the collective good may be entirely unjust to the individual or to the smaller community, while that which is fair to the individual or smaller community may be contrary to what the government sees as benefiting the society overall. The trick for Jewish advocacy is to argue for the right combination of both.

May the new year bring us the wisdom to advocate for a better Canadian society that is at the same time fair to the Jewish life we share as a community. And may it bring us a society that is as delicately balanced as possible to enrich us all.

Shanah Tovah.

Fees up at Toronto's Jewish day schools

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Tuition at seven out of the eight largest Jewish day schools in Toronto is up from three to seven per cent this year – more than Canada's annual rate of inflation.

And in most cases, enrolment has stayed steady.

At Associated Hebrew Day Schools, fees for grades 1 to 8 are $9,800, an increase of five per cent over last year's $9,300. In the preschool (nursery, junior and senior kindergarten), fees went from $8,700 last year to $9,200 for a full day, and from $4,350 a year ago to $4,600 this year for half days – both representing a 5.5 per cent increase.

Enrolment at Associated declined in both elementary school and preschool, but not as much as officials had feared. In the elementary school this year, it's 1,424, down 40 students from last year, and in the preschool, it's 260, down from 283 a year ago. School officials say enrolment is "substantially better" than they were expecting.

At Bialik Hebrew Day School, tuition for this year is $10,600 per student (including a $1,000 building fund), a rise of six per cent from last year's $10,025 (which included a $900 building fund). Enrolment is steady at 804 students (junior kindergarten to Grade 8), compared to 803 a year ago.

The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's two campuses tallied 1,411 students, its largest enrolment ever, up from 1,400 last year. Tuition has increased 4.5 per cent, from $14,495 per student a year ago, to $15,150 this year. CHAT boasts a 93 per cent student retention rate this year.

At Eitz Chaim Day School, senior kindergarten costs $6,900 this year, while fees for grades 1 to 8 are $9,900. Fees from a year ago weren't available, but parents estimated it was around $9,500.

Fees at Leo Baeck Day School are $9,200 this year, up seven per cent from the $8,600 a year ago. Enrolment stands at 832 for this academic year, up from 802 in 2004-'05.

Some fees at Netivot HaTorah Day School have actually decreased. Tuition for both the half- and full-day nursery program dropped this year by seven per cent compared to a year ago, while fees for the full-day junior and senior kindergarten programs declined by three per cent each.

All other fees at Netivot climbed by three per cent this year over last. Tuition for grades 1 to 3 is $9,700, while grades 4 to 8 cost $9,900.

Averaged out, overall fees at Netivot declined by one per cent this year compared to a year ago. Enrolment has stayed at around 580.

Tuition at the Toronto Heschel School is staggered by grade. In junior kindergarten, it's $5,145 this year, up from $4,900 a year ago; from senior kindergarten to Grade 3, fees are $12,500, a rise from $11,650 last year; grades 4 and 5 cost $12,700, compared to $11,850 a year ago; and tuition for grades 6 to 8 is $13,000, up from $12,100 last year.

Overall, fees at Heschel are up an average of seven per cent over last year. Enrolment, meanwhile, is 327, up from 319 a year ago.

Tuition at United Synagogue Day School's grades 2 to 8 rose from $10,500 last year to $10,800 this year – a three per cent increase. Fees for senior kindergarten ($10,000) and grade 1 ($10,300) stayed the same.

USDS officials did not return calls, but at an open meeting for parents last year, the school's board president estimated that this year's enrolment would be 887 students, down from about 1,000 last year.

Ira Walfish and Aaron Blumenfeld, co-chairs of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools, say the real story is not incremental hikes in tuition but the fact that day school fees remain out of reach for the middle class and present a challenge for those who are better off.

"The question is affordability, and the problem lies with Queen's Park," said Blumenfeld, who has helped lead a grassroots campaign at the provincial level for funding of Jewish education.

Joel Kurtz, director of school liaison for UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, said that the figures "just give us added impetus to lobby the government."

Kurtz noted that between 80 and 85 per cent of schools' costs are salaries for teachers and staff.

Walking on the bridge

From the editor's desk

The essence of the holidays that fall in the first three weeks of Tishrei – Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur, Sukkot through to Hoshanah Rabah – is self-assessment, contemplation and reflection.

Of course there are many pathways to such introspection and they need not be restricted to this time of year alone. Within reason, we should be assessing ourselves, asking who we are, on an ongoing basis. And there are many springboards, as we all know – some positive, some negative – for that self-assessment.

But our tradition ordains this season in particular as a special time to dedicate to personal and theological contemplation. Many of us, born into a modern world that is surrounded on all sides of our lives by the myriad proofs of the impressive creativity and engineering skill of the human mind, are quite distant, generally, from theology, from the notion of Divine involvement in the world.

Not surprisingly therefore, the connection between Divine involvement and the possibility of change in our own lives, specifically, is far more remote. We are blocked from "seeing" or understanding some of the truths that our forebears may have seen and understood better in the scientifically inferior time of their own lives.

But the conceit of science is relatively new in the history of mankind and is still incapable of overwhelming the power of the silent mysteries that lie in the wisdom of our millennia-old tradition. Many of us, though, in the parlance of our age, simply, do not know how to "access" that wisdom.

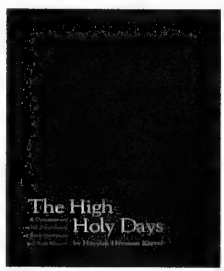
The High Holy Days are an opportunity for doing so.

Ironically though, when so many people around the world flock to synagogue for the holidays, the atmosphere in our places of worship – many of which out of sheer necessity become logistical showcases for the decorum-obsessed management of the movement of human traffic – may actually be less conducive to reflecting on that wisdom. And yet we would not have our synagogues any way other than as full as possible during the holidays. Every Jew on earth should feel welcome and at home in synagogue.

But as Abraham Joshua Heschel once noted of the Jews of eastern Europe (and he could equally have written the same about the Jews of north Africa), "they built no beautiful synagogues, instead they built bridges leading from the heart to God."

Of course, by "bridges" Heschel meant the exceptionally complex, multi-layered, expressive, emotional universe of Jewish prayer.

All of us, regardless of our attachment to modernism and to science and of our estrangement from "religion," can walk across those bridges, even inside the sometimes non-conducive, teeming atmosphere of our crowded synagogues.



Those bridges are in the prayer book, the High Holy Days machzor.

For countless generations it has always been the pathway to the introspection and self-assessment that are the purposes of the holidays. It can also be the pathway for those of us stuck at the bridge's edge, or somewhere even further away from its entrance.

To help us find the bridges or navigate our tentative steps along their shaky floor, we have The High Holy Days: A Commentary on the Prayer Book of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur by Hayyim Herman Kieval, edited by David Golinkin and Monique Susskind Goldberg and published last year by the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem.

The book was first published – rather the first part of the book was published in 1959. Through the laudable initiative of Rabbi Golinkin, president of the Schecter Institute, the book has been expanded to include Rabbi Kieval's previously unpublished manuscript on "Kol Nidre Night."

Rabbi Kieval, the spiritual leader of Temple Israel in Albany, N. Y, for some 31 years until his retirement in 1986, was a scholar and broad Jewish thinker. But his main research and scholarly focus and, as Rabbi Golinkin wrote, his "lifelong passion" was the field of Jewish liturgy. Born in Baltimore in 1920 and ordained as a rabbi at the Jewish Theological Seminary in 1942, he passed away in 1991.

Rabbi Kieval wrote the book "to help open the 'closed book' which the machzor… has become for the majority of our people… Its ultimate purpose is to induce the worshipper to identify himself with the machzor as the sublime expression of his own spiritual aspirations as a faithful Jew."

One can argue that Rabbi Kieval's purpose is even more relevant, more pressing today than it was nearly a half century ago. For many of us, his book can be a compass of sorts to help us navigate our uncertain way along those hidden bridges of the heart.

The book may be purchased at www.schechter.edu. — MBD

HESCHEL HARVEST

Grade 6 teacher Avee Helfand and environmental studies director Ellen Kessler helped junior high students at the Toronto Heschel School harvest vegetables planted last June by the school's 2005 graduating class. Parents weigh their Jewish education options

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

About 150 parents of babies and preschoolers spent last Wednesday evening perusing the options available to them at Jewish day and supplementary schools in the Toronto area.

The third annual event, titled "Options in Jewish Education" was co-sponsored by the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and the Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto.

"We're trying to get an understanding of what's out there," said Jonathan Kreindler, who attended with his wife Corry. They have a two-year-old and are expecting their second child.

"We'd like to make sure our son grows up with a Jewish education, and that it becomes part of his life at an early age," Corry said.

She said it was important to her to find a school that fits in with their beliefs and lifestyle.

In Ontario, where there is no government funding for Jewish day schools, the rising cost of tuition has been a major issue for parents in the past few years.

"It's definitely a big factor," Jonathan said between stops at school information tables. "It's quite expensive, but you make sacrifices for what you think is important."

In a handout based on a document from United Synagogue Day School, parents were advised to talk to the heads of the schools they are considering, and also to speak to parents of children in younger grades.

Suggested areas for discussion included the school's religious philosophy, mission, educational philosophy, support services, and kashrut and allergy policies.

In a panel discussion at the beginning of the evening, Seymour Epstein, the federation's senior vice-president for Jewish education and identity, said that the point of all Jewish schooling is to "pass on our treasure of literature, language, customs and culture."

He added that Jewish education is about "growth and development, adaptation and creativity. These have always been the hallmarks of a vibrant Jewish community."

In Toronto, there are about 17,000 students aged five to 18 in a total of 49 Jewish day and supplementary schools, said BJE chair Baila Lubek.

However, she noted that according to the latest census, there are some 35,000 Jewish children under age 15 in the greater Toronto area. The federation and the BJE are developing initiatives to reach out to more young Jews, she said.

There is a place for every Jewish student, Lubek said, citing a wide variety of types of Jewish schools, as well as BJE subsidies that allowed 2,300 students to attend day and supplementary schools last year.

Prospective day school parent Rebecca Richman checked out a number of schools, including Leo Baeck Day School, which she attended from grades 3 to 6.

"I'd really like [my daughter] to have a Jewish education," she said, although as the mother of an 8-month-old, she felt it was premature to be there.

Among the two dozen schools with table at the event were Ohr Menachem Academy, a Lubavitch school that offered an information brochure in English and Russian; She'arim Hebrew Day School, which serves students with learning disabilities and/or attention deficit hyperactivity disorder; the five-year-old Montessori Jewish Day School; Or HaEmet Sephardic School; Darchei Noam Hebrew School, which is affiliated with Toronto's only Reconstructionist congregation; the Downtown Jewish Community School, a supplementary school serving preschoolers to high school students; and the Hillel Children's Workshop, a Sunday school based at the University of Toronto.

Ontario ministry aims to speed up immigration

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Canadians need to understand the importance of immigration to the country's economy, said Mike Colle, Ontario's minister of citizenship and immigration.

Speaking at last month's annual general meeting of Jewish Vocational Service, Toronto, Colle, who was appointed to the position in June, said that he himself is a "newcomer" to Canada.

"I came [from Italy] when I was five years old, and I grew up at College and Grace. I'm proud to be named minister because I think it is a success story that through sacrifice I went to university, and was elected to parliament.

"It is a [typical] story about the opportunity Canada has given us. The country is strong and dynamic because we have welcomed some of the best and brightest."

With about 130 languages represented in Ontario, "anyone in this room can get on the phone and do business in any language. It is an economic imperative that we take advantage of that.

"The challenge, however, is to recognize the many myths [that surround] immigration. Whenever something goes wrong, we point [a finger] at the immigrants. [We need to think] before we say anything."

With our low birthrate and aging population, he said the province would go into decline without immigration.

"We need to attract immigrants and make sure they reach their potential. We have to make sure they can transfer their skills, and ensure they overcome barriers.

"If a person chooses to leave their country, we have to say 'please come to Ontario.'"

His ministry is focusing on streamlining the applications in order to expedite immigration. "We have a great challenge to ensure that we attract 125,000 immigrants a year. There is a great deal of work to do."

The ministry also supports about 79 agencies that assist newcomers, he said, "because we have a great stake in them succeeding. Hopefully, we will see some money flow to these agencies that provide on-the-ground services, because the 'feds' recognize that we have unique needs."

Colle reminded the group that we need to stand united in reminding people about the advantages of immigration.

"People come from all over the world with nothing but the willingness to work. They only ask for the opportunity to achieve their goals and their potential."

As Ontario gets strong, he said, we can help others. "It is a win-win situation. It is good business to help out a newcomer, because when they succeed they will help us."

He said that about 70 per cent of JVS clients are immigrants, and its staff are the unsung heroes.

Michaëlle Jean

A palpable excitement coursed through the country last week like an electric current through a filament of tungsten. Ottawa was aglow with the swearing in of the country's 27th Governor General, Michaëlle Jean. In the words of a teenager overheard on her way to school, our Governor General is "cool."

Who can argue with that? Jean is herself youthful, intelligent, articulate, photogenic and, by dint of her appointment to Rideau Hall, she will now give new meaning to the term "establishment."

That teenager's observation, however, carries a suggestion for Jean and for all Canadians who see in her appointment the excitement of fresh possibilities.

The Governor General must be above politics. It is, after all, only a ceremonial position and strictly defined by constitutional custom and law. But that very limitation – that she be apolitical and non-partisan – is also the source of the position's credibility. When combined with her impressive ability to communicate and with her natural grace, the inherent credibility of her constitutional role becomes a potent instrument for reaching out to the substantial numbers of Canadian youth who are cynical, to put it mildly, about politics and politicians.

Her first day on the job last week was auspicious. In her inaugural remarks to Parliament, she addressed the country's youth.

"I want our young people to be our standard bearers. I want them to dip into the enormous treasure-trove that is Canada… They are the promise of our future and we have a duty to encourage them to join us in this reinvention of the world."

If the Governor General can inspire young Canadians to look less cynically upon our public institutions, she will have achieved a great achievement. If she can inspire them further, to the belief that public service is both noble and necessary, she will have left a great legacy. And if she can inspire young Canadians to take up the cause of public service, then indeed she will herself have become a leader in "the reinvention of the world." We wish her every success.

Simon Wiesenthal

A leader unique in his time, and unique among all men, was Simon Wiesenthal. From his small, cramped office among the Old World buildings of Vienna, he was the single and singular torch trying to shine even the smallest light into the dark, nether parts of the grey, murky world still inhabited by the murderers from the Nazi regime.

He was buried last week in Jerusalem, "gathered to his people" in the phrase of the Bible so descriptive of him perhaps more than most. For, it was the last defiant act, so to speak, of a life led in constant everyday defiance of the destroyers of European Jewry. Wiesenthal cheated the Nazis. And far worse for them, he hunted for them relentlessly.

He was laid to rest in the one place on earth, Jerusalem, where, forever and for all time, he will truly be among his people.

25 years ago in The CJN

The National Council of Jewish Women and B'nai Brith Upper Canada Lodge launched a program for the deaf and hearing impaired. The first two events were a day-long sukkah building party, and a Sukkot party. A bar mitzvah program was in the planning stages.

Remembering Simon Wiesenthal

My memory of meeting Simon Wiesenthal is still a poignant one.

It was February 1979, three weeks after the film Holocaust had premiered. I was leading a UIA mission from Remembrance, through Rebirth to Renewal: Remembrance – Poland and the death camps; Rebirth – Vienna, the transit stop for Soviet Jews en route to Israel, or elsewhere, and Renewal – Israel and Project Renewal.

Wiesenthal was our guest speaker in Vienna. He told us that in the three weeks following the film's release, there had been more leads to Nazi killers than in the past 30 years.

He told us, too, of how he, an architect by profession, had decided to change the direction of his life. After the war, he was with a friend in a castle in Poland, going through the rooms that were filled with books that had been stolen from Jewish homes. In one book, he found a note from his sister: "I am being hidden by a Christian family. The Nazis are in the house beside us and I know that we will be next," the note said. "If anyone sees my brother, Simon Wiesenthal, please tell him I love him." Wiesenthal fainted. When he came to, he decided to dedicate his life to hunting down the perpetrators of the Holocaust.

In 1979, the search for the Nazi doctor Josef Mengele was on in South America. "I get comfort in knowing," Wiesenthal said to our small group, "that Mengele does not sleep in the same bed twice."

It is heartening to know that even with the death of this giant of a man, the Simon Wiesenthal Center will continue to perpetuate the work of the man who made certain that the victims of the Holocaust would never be forgotten.

Wiesenthal and Wallenberg

The Raoul Wallenberg International Movement for Humanity (RWIMH) expresses its deepest grief at the death of Simon Wiesenthal, a world-renowned Nazi hunter and outstanding humanitarian. A man of exceptional achievement and integrity, he struggled for historic justice, for equality and fairness amongst people.

Wiesenthal was also one of those who strived for the truth about Raoul Wallenberg's fate and who has been an honorary member of RWIMH since its first day and the chair of our international advisory board. His constant support helped us greatly in our activities aimed at disseminating high principles of justice and humanity. Even in a fax of April 5, he expressed his belief in "the significance of presenting a man like Raoul Wallenberg as a role model for the younger generation."

We mourn together with all those who appreciate his honour and dedication, his passionate search for Nazi war criminals and his utmost persistence in bringing them to justice. As a Holocaust survivor, Simon Wiesenthal considered his mission as duty and performed it until the end of his days.

He will never be forgotten.

Sue anti-Israel NGOs

Gerald Steinberg wrote a very important column on government funding of anti-Israel non-governmental organizations ("Canada's contribution to the divestment campaign," CJN, Sept. 1).

Would it not be an idea to approach a politician to raise the issue of inappropriate funding or to sue the government to cease its funding of these NGOs. In the latter case, even if the case was lost, the NGOs' anti-Israel campaign of lies could be brought before the public.

Response to Mendlovic

In Jacob Mendlovic's letter to the editor ("Israel and Pakistan", CJN, Sept. 22), many of his facts and conclusions are wrong. First, Judaism and Hinduism have much in common. Both believe in one God and both believe in doing mitzvot. Secondly, the B'nai Menashe of India were a large group of Jews who lived without anti-Semitism in India for many centuries. To accuse India of anti-Semitism because Gandhi didn't support European Jews during the Holocaust is unfair.

Although India has only recently begun to support Israel, that support is important and steadfast. We should not give it up for those whose support is questionable and who treat Jews as dhimmis in their own countries.

European Jews searching for an assertive voice

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

The 60th anniversary of the end of World War II and the 15th anniversary of the fall of communism took place this year amid a ferment of transition and concern in Europe as a whole and among European Jewry.

A host of world leaders took part in solemn, high-profile ceremonies including one at Auschwitz in January that marked the 60th anniversary of the liberation of the notorious death camp in 1945.

Jews in Europe, meanwhile, grappled with sometimes turbulent internal conflicts and struggled to move out of the shadow of the Shoah and find effective means of asserting their identity and articulating a coherent, collective and positive voice.

They sought a strategy to deal with aging and assimilating populations and respond to anti-Semitism and anti-Jewish, anti-Israel fallout from conflicts in the Middle East.

Like other Europeans, they dealt with new political uncertainties in a continent where the hard-fought European Union constitution failed to win unanimous ratification.

Along with their fellow citizens, they also confronted the spectre of anti-western Islamist terrorism. Three Jews were among the victims of the July 7 suicide attacks on London's public transit system that left more than 50 people dead.

The death of Pope John Paul II in April and the election of German Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger as Pope Benedict XVI also left them with questions.

Pope John Paul had made fostering Jewish-Catholic relations a cornerstone of his 26-year pontificate. In his first months in office, Pope Benedict pledged to follow this course and drew praise from Jewish interfaith activists.

Nonetheless, an ugly spat in July over the Vatican's attitude toward terrorism and Israeli policy toward the Palestinians plunged bilateral relations between Israel and the Holy See to their lowest point in years. Pope Benedict later visited a synagogue in Cologne in his first visit to his native Germany since his election as pope.

Against this background, the European Jewish Congress (EJC), which represents Jewish communities in nearly 40 countries, in June elected a president who pledged to lead European Jewry in new directions.

Pierre Besnainou, a Tunisian-born French businessman, said the EJC has a multifaceted mission: to fight anti-Semitism in Europe, explain to both European politicians and the general public what Israel means and establish broader dialogue between European Jews and Muslims.

"It is hard to put into words just how much the situation of European Jews is affected by the relations between Europe and Israel," Besnainou, 50, told the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz.

"We've gone through a very tough time in the past four years, in which the media has attacked Israel. People often told me, 'Your prime minister, Ariel Sharon,'" he said. "I had to remind them that my prime minister is the prime minister of France."

Before his election, Besnainou had angered American Jewish leaders with sharp attacks on what he called the "presumptuous" and "somewhat patronizing" involvement by American Jewish organizations in European Jewish affairs.

After his election, he reiterated that European Jews had to lobby for their own causes in their own way. American Jews were welcome allies, he said, but not if they bypassed European Jewish representatives.

"I fully respect what American Jewish organizations have accomplished in America and how they have been able to explain what Israel is all about to the U.S. government and to the American public," Besnainou told JTA.

But, he added, "I think that the Americans have tried to overstep the European Jewish organizations. The bridge between Europe and Israel is European Jewry, not American Jewry."

On a more grassroots level, the year was marked by initiatives aimed at broadening effective co-operation in areas such as Jewish education, volunteerism and culture, as well as by episodes of sometimes ugly conflict and power struggles that split some Jewish communities.

Some 150,000 people attended simultaneous events in more than two dozen countries on the annual European Day of Jewish Culture in September, and the London-based European Association for Jewish Culture awarded grants to a roster of artists and performers whose work reflects the Jewish experience.

Jewish children attended the continent's summer camps, and there were well-attended Jewish singles weekends, culture festivals and study sessions in most parts of the continent.

Many European Jews were prominent in local and national politics and mainstream public affairs. In Britain, Conservative party leader Michael Howard, a Jew, missed becoming prime minister when his party lost to incumbent Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labour party in general elections in May.

Also in Britain, an attempt by a prominent academic union to boycott two Israeli universities because of Israel's treatment of the Palestinians was rolled back, but was seen as an ominous sign of how Israel is perceived on the continent. A further incident, in which London Mayor Ken Livingstone insulted a Jewish journalist – comparing him to a concentration camp guard – and then refused to apologize, also unsettled British Jews.

In some countries, Jewish lay and sometimes religious leaders came under criticism for weakness, lack of vision or even financial impropriety. In particular, Jews in Prague remained bitterly divided in the wake of continuing battles between rival factions, and in Budapest, the president of the Hungarian Jewish Federation stepped down after his reform program was defeated.

In Zagreb, Croatia, the decision by the community board to fire the rabbi touched off a spiral of acrimonious accusations among rival communal leaders.

Conflicts between Orthodox and Reform Jews deepened in some countries, too, and some religious leaders came under criticism for being too exclusive and stifling pluralism.

In May, the Orthodox Conference of European Rabbis said it would send a top-level delegation to Israel to formally protest recent moves there to legalize new forms of conversions under the Law of Return that, they said, were too lenient.

Meanwhile, Jews from across the continent were among nearly 400 Progressive, Liberal and Reform Jews from 24 countries who took part in the annual convention of the World Union of Progressive Judaism, held in Moscow in late June and early July.

The Chabad-Lubavitch movement gained influence across the continent, in some places setting up or sponsoring activities and institutions that paralleled those run by established Jewish communities. In Budapest, a Chabad-backed congregation was officially registered by the government as the revived incarnation of a prewar stream of Hungarian Jewry.

Observers found some internal conflicts threatening to Jewish development, particularly in post-communist countries where the often tiny Jewish communities that emerged after the fall of communism were still fragile. Others, however, said many of the disputes represented healthy signs of a normalization of Jewish life.

A number of these divisions formed the basis for debate in May at a meeting in Basel, Switzerland, organized by the European Council of Jewish Communities that grouped more than 200 Jewish community presidents and other communal leaders from more than 30 countries.

The title of one of the sessions spelled this out. It was called "A Single European Jewish Voice Is a Fantasy That Can Never Be Achieved."

Why ritual?

Does God care if I say this prayer once or 10 times? What difference does it make if I drink on Yom Kippur? Who cares if I sit in synagogue, or pray when and where I am spiritually moved? What use to me this ritual?

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Surely, during this season of ritual intensity, we are bothered by these kinds of questions. What is the purpose and efficacy of ritual? Traditionalists will be satisfied to say "Tradition!" Many will be content with an acknowledgment of God's ultimate and mysterious commandments to us. But others, even while accepting God's commanding presence in our lives, will wonder about the details and specificity of ritual.

Ritual is about repetition and religious ritual is both public and social. All religious ritual is destined to affirm, celebrate and create sacred experiences that give meaning to life. But how does ritual affect us this way?

If we focus on the details, on the minutiae of every ritual event, we will be hard-pressed to find meaning or holiness. Some details appear random, awkward or even silly. But taken in an undivided context, with an awareness of the complete pattern, each ritual element has the potential to focus our consciousness, give meaning to our existence and elevate our spiritual experience.

Shabbat is a phenomenal experience that separates us and our days from the mundane. It is constructed from a series of prohibitions and requirements. Yet, the totality of the experience is not to be found in any one element such as eating challah. However, the combined effect of having special meals with breads that signify holiness and replace or remind us of temple sacrifices, enables a totally new perspective to overtake the meal.

Lighting Sabbath or festival candles is not automatically uplifting. Sometimes it is downright frenzied. But bringing light into your life at a particular moment, dedicating a ritual act and its light to enlightenment – as well as to familial and personal harmony, and to communal survival – transports one to a different level of serenity, to an awareness of the sacred and an appreciation of the preciousness of life. All from two little candles!

Yom Kippur rituals of fasting and prayer combine to create a day of extreme holiness. It's not clear to any of us what God's reaction is. But it is clear to me where our response leads. We sense religious ritual in all its power, fascination and excitement.

At the closing prayer of Neilah, as we repeat certain phrases 10 times, the energy, confidence and joy of the congregation overwhelms me. We have achieved religious exhilaration together. In that minute before we run home and turn our thoughts to food, we have surely experienced the holy. That is the purpose of ritual.

Atonement

Jews and Catholics have very different modes of repentance. Ours is specific and spoken on behalf of the community. The simple theology behind this approach is that we personally may not have committed all the errors we recite, but somewhere in them are the failings we own. In this way, we also affirm our responsibility for the whole community.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Sins are overwhelmingly related to speech, slander, lies, malicious gossip, curses and insults about both our enemies and those close to us. We may not literally shed blood, but by our slanderous and uncontrollable tongue have brought shame to those around us.

For a Catholic, the confessional is deeply personal –"I have sinned" – and the penance is personal, too. I remember going with girlfriends to church and waiting outside while they went to confession and came out absolved of what they had done.

So to read one Catholic's attempt to atone for 2,000 years of persecution is to enter a world that is strangely familiar, yet completely alien. James Carroll's Constantine's Sword: the Church and the Jews is the account of his struggle to retain his deeply felt Catholic faith, yet confront the actions of his Church that made the relentless persecution of Jews not just possible, but mandatory, right up until the Final Solution and the Church's indifference and, in some ways, complicity in that massacre.

This book is painful to read. Brought up as an Irish Catholic – and having been a priest for nine years – Carroll is intimately familiar with the theology and history of his Church.

Beginning with the split from Judaism of the early Jewish Christians, Carroll traces the development of the Church's attitudes toward the continued existence of the Jews. Augustine saw them as "witness people" who had to be protected, yet never allowed to thrive, so that their suffering would testify to the truth of Christianity. But too soon this subtle distinction was lost, and by the Crusades, the people and the priests who led them could no longer make that fine theological distinction.

Thus, the teaching of contempt became the need to destroy. The Inquisition, the requirement of "pure blood" for conversos in Spain and elsewhere (including the order of Jesuits, who only mitigated, not removed, the category as a requirement for the order in 1946), the Vatican's Concordat with Hitler – each chapter is filled with the pain of a writer who cannot but say, over and over again, "I'm so sorry, so ashamed."

For this one man, the realization that his Church had early on lost its way is excruciating. (I use that word advisedly, since its root is the word for cross.) The Gospels themselves reflect the writers' intention to absolve the Romans and implicate "The Jews." Once the Jews became deicides, it was only a matter of time before they merited contempt, then harassment, then expulsion, then death.

Nor does Carroll see much hope for a change in the Church, even after Vatican II and the "act of repentance" in the Church's 1998 document "We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah." All it does, he writes, is "to put responsibility for failure on the Church's children, never on the Church."

So we come back to the difference between Jewish and Catholic penance.

Individual Catholics such as Carroll can ask for forgiveness and achieve atonement. But the Church – and here past and present popes concur – is free of taint. The Jews are still victims of individual faults, not dead as a result of the very attitudes the Church still protects and promotes. If there is no salvation outside the Church, then what to do with those who do not merit salvation?

"This has been the story of the worst thing about my Church, which is the worst thing about myself. I offer it as my personal penance to God, to the Jewish dead, and to my children… The Christian conscience – mine – can never be at peace."

There were other choices, Carroll points out, that the Church could have made along the line. But until it recognizes the extent of its own collective and communal responsibilities, those missed opportunities will force Catholics such as Carroll to continue to be the "I" – not the "we" – in his atonement.

Yom Kippur is a time of reflection

Yom Kippur is often described as the holiest day of the year in the Jewish calendar. The mere mention of Yom Kippur conjures up personal memories that are unique to all of us. During the yizkor service, we think of persons dear to us and the passing of generations. On this holy day, collectively, we might recall the vulnerability of the State of Israel and the overcoming of that vulnerability during the Yom Kippur war.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Yom Kippur, of course, emphasizes the erasure of past sins through atonement. Upon what else should we concentrate on this special day? There may be some liturgically correct answers found in our scriptures. We attend shul; we do not go to work or school on Yom Kippur. It is, as every Shabbat should be, a day of reflection. It should be a day when we reflect on the past year, past generations, a day to take stock of our lives and a day to reflect on the future.

We can also reflect on our own society, count our blessings, pray for others less fortunate or others subject to the ravages of sickness, natural disaster, war and oppression.

This month marks the 14th column I have written for this publication. If reflection is appropriate for this time of year, I can think back and recapture some of the themes I have shared with you, among them, the importance of community, the gift of storytelling in capturing a permanent record of our parents' and grandparents' generations and the importance of sharing our lives with our own children and grandchildren.

I have shared thoughts on the use of sharia as part of the dispute resolution process in Canada and the ever-present danger of anti-Semitism in what we hope is an accepting and decent society. I have talked about violence in the name of God as a world challenge to peace and solidarity. And I have shared some views on the growing influence of organized religion on the making of policy and political decision-making in general. Most importantly, I have returned to the theme that Canada is a nation based on constitutionally protected values, values that promote human rights and human dignity.

Since sharing these themes over the past year, the government of Ontario has made a final determination on the issue of sharia, opting to amend Ontario's Arbitration Act to prohibit the use of a religiously based arbitration process under that act.

Days after the article on the danger of complacency in the face of anti-Semitism was submitted, there was yet another disturbing incident – a swastika was painted on a sign marking the site for a planned Jewish community centre in Richmond Hill, Ont.

Sadly, this year has ended with the news of the death of Simon Wiesenthal, an individual whose life was dedicated to the bringing to justice of more than 1,100 Nazi war criminals.

On Wiesenthal's death in Vienna, Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean and founder of the International Human Rights NGO named in Wiesenthal's honour, said: "Simon Wiesenthal was the conscience of the Holocaust. When the Holocaust ended… the whole world went home to forget… he became the permanent representative of the victims, determined to bring the perpetrators of the history's greatest crime to justice… He just took the job. It was a job no one else wanted."

This Yom Kippur, we should reflect on the life of Simon Wiesenthal and how his work and perseverance serve as an example in the fight against injustice, hate and anti-Semitism. His life is a dramatic reminder that each of us has the capacity to confront historic wrongs in constructive ways.

We should strengthen our sense of community, whether that be local national or beyond. We should keep both the sad reminders of days gone by together with the precious memories of our past alive through our storytelling. And we should preserve and guard the vital but fragile pillars of human rights that serve as a foundation of our homes, communities and our broader society.

Yom Kippur is a time of reflection – we reflect on the liturgical themes that mark the day and we reflect on our own life and times. Through this process, we will refresh our lives as we embark on the new year.

Sharon girds for new challenge from Netanyahu

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The burning question before Likud's 3,000 central committee members was whether the party's primaries should take place in November, as Netanyahu and his backers hoped, or in April, as originally planned.

If Netanyahu's motion had passed, Sharon's position would have been gravely imperilled, possibly forcing him to call a snap election and thereby plunging Israel into a period of uncertainty in the wake of its Sept. 12th unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and four isolated West Bank settlements. Alternatively, Sharon – one of the founders of Likud – could have bolted the party and formed a new centrist bloc.

These scenarios vanished in a puff when Sharon sidelined Netanyahu, who previously had also served as his foreign minister. But the issue that provoked last week's showdown, Israel's pullout from Gaza after a 38-year occupation characterized by unceasing Palestinian resistance, remains on Netanyahu's agenda. Having positioned himself as a hardliner to the right of Sharon, Netanyahu plans to challenge him in next year's spring primaries. And so the Likud is a house divided.

Ariel Sharon

From the outset, Netanyahu opposed the disengagement as an egregious mistake, accusing Sharon of ditching sacred Likud principles, trampling on its values, embracing the policies of the left and betraying the party. Yet in the face of resignations by like-minded, but more principled, ministers such as Natan Sharansky, who supported his bid to topple Sharon, Netanyahu blithely remained in Sharon's government.

Netanyahu could have quit many months ago in a show of displeasure with Sharon's policy and worked from the outside to derail his Gaza withdrawal plan. But much to the disgust of true-blue Likudniks, he stayed on in a de facto acceptance of the disengagement, determined to implement his conservative supply-side economic policies.

To some, his double dealing smacked of a shocking deficit in personal integrity, a charge that had been hurled against him when he was prime minister from 1996 to 1999. Until his abrupt, but not all that surprising, resignation from cabinet on Aug. 7, Netanyahu preferred to fight for his views from the inside.

As an insider, he made numerous demands. In March 2004, a month after Sharon officially announced his intention to leave Gaza, Netanyahu laid out three conditions for tacitly accepting the disengagement. He asked that all points of entry into Gaza – by land, sea and air – should remain in Israel's hands. He insisted that Israel should categorically reject the Palestinian demand for the right of return. He called for Israel's separation barrier to be finished before the withdrawal. In line with his own thinking, Sharon met the first two conditions, but left the third one unfulfilled.

Netanyahu also urged Sharon to evacuate Gaza's 8,500 Jewish settlers in three stages so that the Palestinians would not interpret the pullout as a retreat under fire. Sharon initially assured Netanyahu that the evacuation would be implemented in phases, but in the end, the settlers were forced out in one fell swoop, in less than a week.

A year ago, citing the need to maintain national unity, Netanyahu called for a nationwide referendum over Gaza. Netanyahu's suggestion, however, was widely seen as a delaying tactic. In any event, the Knesset voted against a referendum by a considerable margin.

When Yasser Arafat, the president of the Palestinian Authority, died last November, Netanyahu tried yet another gambit, arguing that the withdrawal should be suspended altogether. Sharon studiously ignored his advice.

Six months ago, in keeping with his insistence on "reciprocity," Netanyahu was at it again. He blasted the unilateral dimension of disengagement, saying that Israel would receive nothing tangible in return from the Palestinians, and urging Sharon to annex vast chunks of the West Bank.

Having concluded that his campaign to subvert the withdrawal had fallen on deaf ears, Netanyahu finally resigned, reiterating his mantra that the disengagement plan was hopelessly flawed; that Israel would not get concessions from the Palestinians; that rejectionist groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad would grow stronger; and that Israel would be far less secure.

Netanyahu did not address the key issues that made the retention of Gaza unsustainable. He did not speak of the demographic imperatives – the astronomical Palestinian birthrate. He chose to ignore stark political realities – the need for Israel to nurture pivotal relationships with the United States and the European Union and avoid isolation. He did not talk about the moral untenability of maintaining an occupation for the sole benefit of 8,500 Jews in a miserable strip of land inhabited by 1.3 million Palestinians. He did not mention the fact that scarce resources were being pumped into a doomed enterprise when so much poverty still afflicts Israeli society. And he overlooked the obvious: settlement in Gaza was counter-productive in terms of providing security for Israel.

Benjamin Netanyahu

When Netanyahu announced his intention on Aug. 30 to challenge Sharon's preeminence, he bypassed these core concerns and instead dwelled on the "evil" nature of the scheduled withdrawal and the probability that Hamas and Islamic Jihad would transform Gaza into an Islamic terrorist entity.

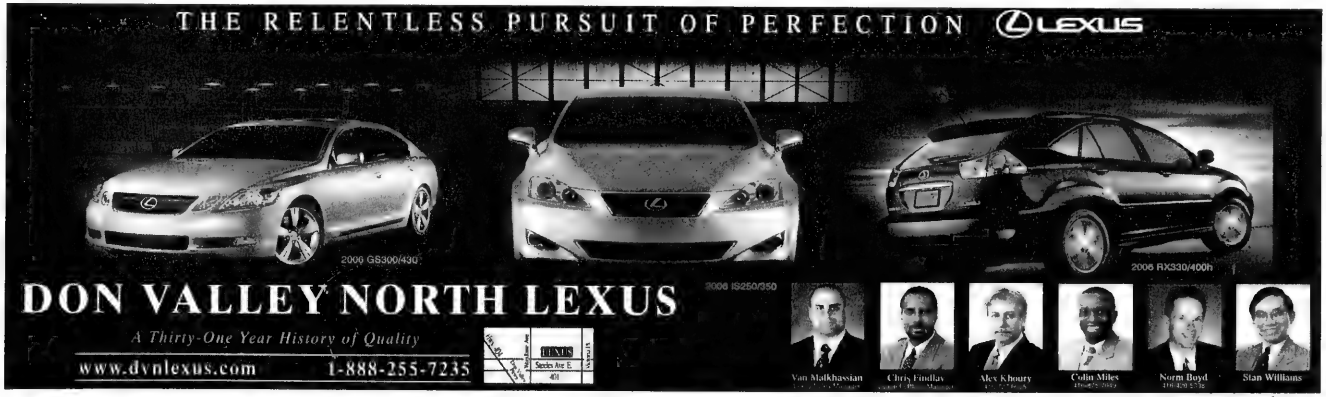
Facing such unbridled rhetoric, Sharon, no dove, veered to the right to appease his Likud base. He asserted that Gaza would be Israel's last unilateral withdrawal. He declared that he intended to keep the major settlement blocs in the West Bank. He said that Jerusalem's current status was non-negotiable. Last week, Sharon's political aide, Eyal Arad, upped the ante, declaring that Israel might annex parts of the West Bank if the diplomatic deadlock with the Palestinians continues. But in a conciliatory mid-September speech at the United Nations, Sharon observed that the Palestinians are entitled to "a national, sovereign existence in a state of their own."

In reacting to Netanyahu's challenge, Sharon was unequivocal. He accused Netanyahu of being temperamentally unfit to be prime minister, a comment seconded by Ehud Olmert, the deputy prime minister. And in a sombre warning, Sharon predicted that Likud would self-destruct if Netanyahu was at the helm.

These arguments may have swayed some minds in Likud's hawkish central committee, but what probably left the deepest impression was Sharon's harsh military response to a barrage of rockets and mortars fired by Hamas into the Negev region in the last week of September, wounding five civilians in Sderot. Sharon had warned the Palestinians that he would react harshly to terrorism following Israel's withdrawal from Gaza, and he kept his word.

In a series of air strikes that once more shattered last winter's shaky ceasefire, Israel hit Qassam rocket workshops and Fatah offices throughout Gaza, killed Mohammed Khalil – the commander of Islamic Jihad's military wing in southern Gaza – and rounded up hundreds of militants, some of whom intend to run in next January's Palestinian election. Apparently intimidated by what Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz described as Israel's "iron fist" policy, Hamas called off further attacks against Israel.

The latest round of fighting, ironically, may well have undermined Netanyahu's brazen quest for Sharon's job. But Netanyahu claimed that the violence merely validated his belief that the pullout had been a grievous mistake.



20,000 Falas Mura to be rescued over next three years

By DAVID LEVINE

Micha Feldman is back in action - doing what he loves to do best. As a consultant on Ethiopian issues to the Israel Defence Forces, the Jewish Agency for Israel and the Israel Crisis Management Centre, Feldman will be helping to rescue 20,000 Ethiopians over the next three years from a poverty stricken existence by bringing them to Israel. It's all part of Operation Promise, a new North American Jewish Federation initiative. The new Ethiopian immigrants are Falas Mura - Jews who, under duress, converted to Christianity centuries ago.

Micha Feldman didn't become known to thousands of Israeli Ethiopians as "Abba Micha" overnight. Feldman's devotion to Ethiopian Jews actually began 35 years ago.

Back then, says Feldman, he would go to visit Ethiopian children in their Israeli youth villages. Of the 14,000 Ethiopian Jews in Israel in 1984, 1,600 children, known as "orphans by circumstance," could not cope with separation from their parents. Feldman's commitment to aliyah began there. "I would swear to them that I would personally take care of bringing their parents to Israel," Feldman told a recent UJA Federation audience.

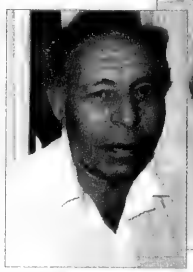
When diplomatic relations between Israel and Ethiopia resumed in 1989, Feldman was appointed as Israeli Consul to Ethiopia and head of the Jewish Agency mission there.

"When you get such an offer," said Feldman, "you consult with your family. I consulted with my wife and four children after saying 'yes'."

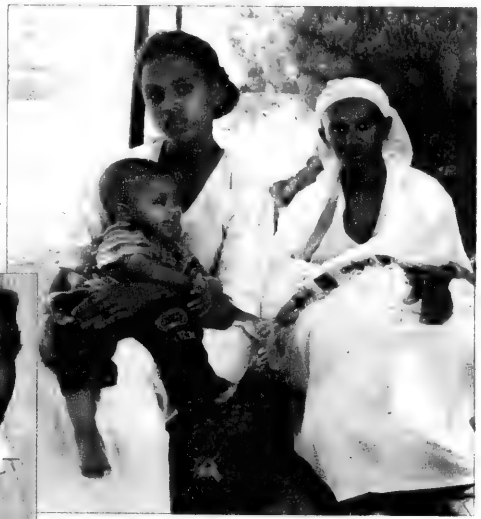
In May 1991, Feldman was one of the chief engineers of Operation Solomon, which brought over 14,000 Ethiopian Jews from Addis Ababa to Israel in 36 hours.

Now, 13 years later, through Operation Promise, Micha Feldman knows there are serious challenges ahead, but he remains optimistic. He has to.

"The real task is the absorption process," he said. "It's a long task integrating Ethiopians into white society; bringing largely illiterate and uneducated people from rural villages to Israel. But, the children show so much promise; they are the key to the future and through Operation Promise, we are investing heavily in that future."



Micha Feldman



Operation Promise will bring 20,000 Ethiopians to Israel over the next three years.

Wolfe to expand role of Jewish Foundation

Elizabeth Wolfe is no stranger to community work. The new chair of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, Wolfe, a self-professed "professional volunteer," has served on over 35 community boards and committees since 1984.

Elizabeth Wolfe

As the chair of the Jewish Foundation, UJA Federation's planned giving arm and Jewish Toronto's philanthropic resource centre, Wolfe's long-term priority is increasing visibility for the Foundation, with total assets of $130 million. Wolfe also hopes to expand the role of the Jewish Foundation, working to house endowment funds on behalf of other community organizations, such as synagogues and schools, and to create an education superfund to respond to rising costs of day school education. The Jewish Foundation distributed over $6 million in grants to more than 135 organizations last year.

"We need to acknowledge our unique position in history," Wolfe explains, in terms of our own strength in the community and we need to accept the responsibility that goes along with that."

Wolfe, a lawyer and mother of two, comes by her volunteering work honestly. Her father, Ray D. Wolfe, was the chair of the United Jewish Welfare Fund in 1963 and her mother, Rose Wolfe, served as the first female chair of Toronto Jewish Congress. Both organizations are predecessors of the current UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Wolfe's new role with the Jewish Foundation, as well her volunteer work with the Board of Jewish Education and the new Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage, continues her family's involvement in the community.

When she began her volunteer work, says Wolfe. "There were no real female lay-leaders. There were only a handful of women who participated. I will continue to help transform the leadership of the community, so that women can play a key role."

Toronto General Assembly attracts top speakers

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

If you're planning on attending the upcoming General Assembly (GA) in Toronto - the largest Jewish conference in the world - there's just no telling who you might run into over a cup of coffee at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre.

The GA, which runs from November 13 to 15, is attracting some of the Jewish world's "A-List" personalities, who will be on hand to address the 4,000 delegates coming to Toronto from around the globe.

Giving the GA a distinctive Canadian "G-eh" flavour will be Canada's Minister of Justice, Irwin Cotler, who is not only a senior federal cabinet minister, but also a past president of Canadian Jewish Congress, with a track record as one of the world's most respected human rights advocates.

Cotler recently headed the Canadian delegation to the Stockholm International Forum on the Prevention of Genocide and, as an international human rights lawyer, he served as counsel to several former prisoners of conscience, including South Africa's Nelson Mandela and Andrei Sakharov of the Former Soviet Union.

Dr. Deborah Lipstadt, director, Rabbi A. Tam Institute for Jewish Studies in Atlanta, is another prominent GA speaker. She is best known for her libel trial in London, instigated by Holocaust denier David Irving. Irving sued her for calling him a Holocaust denier and right-wing extremist, but, after a six-year legal battle, Lipstadt won her case.

Valerie Harper

Earlier this year, Professor Lipstadt was asked by President George W. Bush to represent him as a member of the official American delegation to the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz.

During the opening plenary, Ben Stein, a writer, lawyer, journalist, professor and a television personality, will help kick things off as he shares stories about the history, values and dreams of the Jewish people.

A recent addition to the impressive list of GA speakers is Valerie Harper, a four-time Emmy Award-winning actor who achieved fame as Rhoda Morgenstern on The Mary Tyler Moore Show, and her own spin-off series, Rhoda. A native of Suffern, New York, Harper is currently receiving tremendous reviews for her portrayal of former Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir, in a national tour of the Broadway smash Golda's Balcony.

Deborah Lipstadt

Another speaker who promises to deliver an important address may not be known for his work in movies or television, but in terms of Jewish education, he's widely regarded as a star.

Rabbi Josh Elkin, executive director of Partners for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE) will speak about the universal importance of Jewish education. Founded by American philanthropist Michael Steinhardt, PEJE, along with UJA Federation and its Board of Jewish Education, have been partnering to increase enrolment at Toronto's Jewish schools and enhance their excellence.

The GA's international chair is Toronto's Julia Koschitzky, while UJA Federation's Peter Ekstein and Debbie Kimel serve as Toronto's community chairs.

To register for the GA visit www.GAtoronto.com or call 416.849.1000.

UJA Federation Campaign 2006 surpasses $32 million

Super Week raises over $2.5 million

It takes hundreds of individuals and tons of hard work to raise over 2.5 million dollars through telethons for UJA Federation Campaign 2006, now underway.

That's exactly what a team of dedicated volunteers accomplished over the course of five days of Super Week, beginning with Super Sunday on September 25th. Some 700 telethon canvassers contacted 3,500 donors, boosting the Campaign 2006 total to more than $32 million. Super Sunday / Super Weeks chairs are Helen Silverstein and Mark Satok.

UJA Federation Campaign 2006 is at the beginning of a drive to raise an additional $10 million over three years for Jewish youth at risk. The campaign is concentrating on three strategic commitments: social justice-assisting the poor and vulnerable; rebuilding Israeli lives after five years of terror and connecting Jewish youth to Jewish life.

For some Super Week volunteers, it was their first time on the phones while for one veteran, Sam Horowitz, 89, this campaign marked over 50 years of devoted service.

"When I came to Canada I wanted my son to attend Talmud Torah on Brunswick Avenue but I couldn't afford it," Horowitz explained. "At that time the Jewish community helped me with the tuition. Now I'm giving back. I've been doing this for so many years, from when the Federation was on Beverley Street. We were a small group back then; we had a good time, and I keeping coming back for more. "

One of the youngest telethon volunteers, seven and a half year old Adam Levin was no less committed to his task than any veteran in the room. Too young to make phone calls himself, he helped to sort pledge cards, running sheets from one call room to the next. This was also Levin's first year to make his own pledge, one he proudly acknowledges came from his own bank account.

"It really made me feel great to make my own pledge," Levin said. "My parents are here. It's something we do together. I think it's really important to help with this cause."

Adam Levin

Marni and Daniel Bar-Dayan had never volunteered at a UJA Federation telethon before but were determined to get involved this year.

"We wanted to get more involved with our community," Daniel explained. "I've done pledge cards at home and we've been participating in Young Adult Division (YAD) programs, like packing food at the Second Harvest food bank. I really connected with UJA's campaign goal of rebuilding Israeli lives," he continued. "I have lots of family in Israel and that is important to me, so I'm doing my part."

"I can't believe how generous people are," Robert Horowitz, a first timer and grade nine CHAT (Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto) student said. "I've already raised $1,300 from eight pledges in only one and half hours. I'm really psyched. I'll be back next year, no doubt."

"This is my fourth year doing telethons and it's a great way to meet new people. I went to Day School and I feel like this is just a continuation to that education I received."

Karen Hayeem

"My mother has been pretty involved in UJA and I also think it's important to give back to the community."

Nicole Salama

"Telethons are the way UJA supports all its great programs. This is the core and I feel it's important to support UJA by working on the phones."

Josh Shuval

"This is an important way to build community."

Keith Isaac,
Co-Chair, Young Adult Division

"I do this annually; it's not always easy but it's essential and that's why I've been doing this for over 20 years."

Jeffrey Feldman, Co-Chair, Young Lawyers and Accountants Division

Ben Deverett, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) student.

Linda Frum Sokolowski - a compassionate leader

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

Sitting down to lunch with Linda Frum Sokolowski, chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign and Advocacy, I was anticipating an altogether different experience. After all, she is the daughter of the late, renowned broadcast journalist Barbara Frum, a member of Canadian journalism royalty. I thought I might encounter a professionally brisk woman, someone used to the spotlight being shone directly at her. However, the truth is Linda is gracious and thoughtful and thoroughly engaged in Jewish issues with a passion and commitment that is both intense and inspiring.

Linda credits her husband, Howard Sokolowski, a past UJA Federation campaign chair, with influencing her interest in community work and involving herself with the pressing issues facing Jews today.

"When Howard and I got together, he was one of those people who did everything and I, in comparison, felt like I was doing nothing. He was instrumental in getting me to take on community volunteer work. When you are married to the UJA campaign chair, it's a great initiation because I went to a lot of events with him and hosted a lot. I learned an enormous amount."

Linda Frum Sokolowski

What is immediately clear after talking with Linda is that she is emotive and compassionate about all the causes for which UJA Federation raises money and thoughtful about the impact she is having.

"I asked myself why I took on this job; it is very demanding of everything, especially time. But I do feel beyond anything it is essential for my children to see me do this, that, my commitment to Jewish life is such that I wanted to spend so much time working on this. I really feel that in a way, I took this on for my children as much as it takes me away from them."

Linda is also insightful about her mother and the influence she has had on her life. It is never easy growing up in the shadow of a famous parent, but Linda sees the spirit of her mother in all that she does and is so grateful for the relationship they shared.

"The bottom line is that I adored my mother. She was a wonderful mother. When you're the kid you don't really think of your mother as a public person. You just think of her as your parent. I was very proud of her, but mostly, I just enjoyed our mother-daughter relationship."

It is the same close relationship she shares with her brother, David, an author and former presidential speech writer who is also frequently in the public eye.

"We are incredibly close. I often go to him for counsel. He is especially supportive of my role in the community and a very big figure in my life."

Linda is only half way through her term as chair, but in the familiar, unassuming manner in which she has conducted our entire conversation, she is more grateful for what she has received than what she has been able to give.

"We need to keep our eyes open to the suffering that goes on in this world and that we are living our lives in an appropriate way. And as much as I put into my work, I am getting so much more in return. I have met incredible people. I am learning so much and what we are doing is just essential work. It's a daily dose of perspective. "

Former SS camp guard Baumgartner dies

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A former SS volunteer who served as a guard in two notorious Nazi concentration camps has died.

Michael Baumgartner, an 83-year-old retired Windsor autoworker, died on June 18, four years after a Federal Court judge found he had lied to immigration authorities about his Nazi service and obtained Canadian citizenship by fraud.

Baumgartner's case had been in a sort of legal limbo since then: the federal cabinet, which has the power to remove citizenship, had been sitting on the case.

Frank Miller, Baumgartner's lawyer, said his client had been despondent about his situation. He had refused to take his medication and had said he did not care if he lived or died.

Baumgartner received little sympathy from spokespeople for Jewish community organizations, who said he should have never have been allowed into Canada in the first place.

What's more, said representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada, government foot-dragging in the Baumgartner case and in others concerning Nazi war criminals sends a message that Canada offers refuge for war criminals.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber said that "it's a sad day not just for the Jewish community but for Canadians in general when the government seems to choose a path of inaction on Nazi war criminals, rather than action.

"At the time when the window of opportunity is almost closed, the government should do all in its power to send a message to future generations that… those who assisted in the Nazi machinery of death were brought to justice."

Lawyer David Matas, B'nai Brith's spokesperson on war crimes, said Baumgartner is one of many war criminals to have escaped justice in Canada: "The government has a lineup of people who lost in Federal Court and they haven't done anything after that to revoke their citizenship."

There are more Nazi suspects who have died during legal proceedings than who have been removed, he noted.

Four cases remain before the cabinet, involving Wasyl Odynsky, Helmut Oberlander, Jacob Fast and Vladimir Katriuk. The cases were initiated in 1997, 1995, 1999 and 1996 respectively.

Odynsky lost in court in 2001. Fast's case has been before cabinet for two year, while the Katriuk case has been before cabinet since 1999.

"It makes a mockery of the law when a court makes a decision and the cabinet sits on it for six years," Matas said.

Case was in legal limbo

A Federal Court judge found that Oberlander had served as an interpreter in an Einsatzkommando unit, a mobile killing squad whose only job was to murder Jews. He lost his citizenship, won on appeal and his case remains before cabinet.

Odynsky served as a guard at the Poniatowa concentration camp where 15,000 civilians were killed; Fast was part of an auxiliary police unit in Ukraine that participated in the roundup and killing of Jews; Katriuk was a platoon commander in a battalion that committed atrocities during the war, Matas said.

Matas blamed the cabinet's inaction on Prime Minister Paul Martin. "He's holding it up. What other conclusion is there to draw? Who else would hold it up in that circumstance?

"To me what it shows is a lack of political will to deal with a very serious problem."

Martin and other senior government officials have periodically asserted that justice for Nazi war criminals remains a priority.

Asked to comment on Matas' assertions, Orli Namian, deputy press secretary in the Prime Minister's Office, said "I cannot comment on anything on the cabinet's agenda. If a decision comes out of cabinet, it is announced in due course."

Matas said the result of political foot-dragging has been that "Canada continues to be a magnet for modern war criminals."

Farber agreed that war criminals from places like Rwanda and Bosnia "see Canada's record and say, 'Here's a good place to hide out.'

"Canada is more than soft, and it's to our everlasting shame," he said.

"I fear that in 10 years, Rwandan survivors will find themselves face to face with their persecutors and wonder how this happened," he added.

One war crimes case continues to move ahead – in Italy.

The Federal Court was holding hearings in Verona last week to determine whether Vancouver resident Michael Seifert, 85, should be extradited to Italy. In 2000, an Italian military court convicted Seifert in absentia of murder, rape and torture. They found he served as an SS guard at the Bolzano transit camp and had terrorized prisoners.

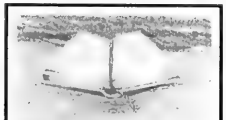
Getting God to throw out that ticket

By RABBI EZRIEL SITZER

Imagine the following: You are caught speeding. You pull over to the side of the road, waiting in your car for what seems like an eternity, but is actually only about three minutes – what takes them so long? – nervously awaiting your fate.



Rabbinic Reflections

The officer approaches slowly, and asks in a rhetorical, wry kind of way, "Do you know how fast you were going?" (What does he expect us to say – "Yes officer, I do. I clocked myself at 135? Am I right?") You are then handed a ticket and left thinking about better ways the money could have been spent and how many points this one cost. (I've never understood why they keep the points a secret. If I ever become premier of Ontario, one of the first things I plan on changing is to obligate officers to write the points right there on the ticket.)

Months later, you show up for a hearing, pleading your case to a clerk and asking for a pardon. "You see sir, I was on my way to a wedding. I was the officiating rabbi. I must have been lost in my thoughts about what to say – it's not always as easy as it may seem – and lo and behold, there I was, 35 clicks over the limit." The chances are excellent you'll be let off. To review the rules of the game: You speed. You get nabbed. You get a ticket. You fight it. You win. Simple, right?

But wait! Isn't this exactly how God deals with us? Here's how it goes: You blow it. You get caught. (He pretty much knows what we're up to 24/7.) You're judged (Rosh Hashanah). You fight it (on the days between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.) You win, and the charges are dropped – hopefully (Yom Kippur).

If we're going to be charged, only to have the charge or charges annulled, why not just go straight into Yom Kippur, or at least have Rosh Hashanah follow Yom Kippur. Why have Rosh Hashanah, our Day of Judgment, first, only to have the judgment cancelled on Yom Kippur, our Day of Atonement?

There are so many answers to this question that we will have to limit the possibilities to two. The first is that if we were not first charged to the full extent of the law, or in our case judged, we wouldn't feel the urgency to act or be as determined to fight – or be as resolved to change. To tangibly have the ticket placed in our hand, to stand in front of the Almighty and be given our verdict, clearly demands a call to action.

A second reason may apply more to Rosh Hashanah than the traffic ticket analogy. To plead our case and ask that the verdict be overturned is to consider that what we did was wrong; to regret, to be remorseful, to be apologetic – all hard things to do. It's easier to not have to deal with our past wrongdoings and to start fresh. Don't worry about what was. Today, on Rosh Hashanah, I can be the person that I have always wanted to become. Nothing is stopping me or holding me back. But if we view ourselves based on our past deeds, we'll give up trying to improve ourselves. It's just too hard to deal with.

On Rosh Hashanah, we are inspired to become better people – to be softer, kinder and wiser. The days between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur afford us an opportunity to act out and live those small but significant resolutions made on Rosh Hashanah, so that by the time Yom Kippur arrives – when we're a little stronger and our new positions and attitude are more secure – we can start to deal with our past from a new position of strength.

Love trumps revenge at Camp Koby

By ROBBIE HANDELMAN

Is it right to condemn someone's vengeful feelings about the murder of someone they held dear?

After all, a common response to loss or sorrow is anger and hatred.

But that can't be said about the children at Israel's Camp Koby, who have all lost either a parent or sibling to terror. Despite those losses, however, the camp is filled with unconditional love and kindness, rather than thoughts of hatred and revenge.

Guest Voice

This is one of the many miracles of Camp Koby, and of the Koby Mandell Foundation, founded by Sherri and Rabbi Seth Mandell in honour of their eldest child Koby. The 13-year-old boy and his friend were bludgeoned to death while hiking near their homes in the Gush Etzion community of Tekoa in 2001. Their murderer has not been found.

As a Canadian working with foreign children, I had many fears and anxieties about my summer plans. I was most fearful of not being able to reach out to the children and of not being able to make a difference in their lives. But my training for camp prepared me for depression, anger and the worst reactions to terror, so I was confident that I could warm the hearts of the campers.

I couldn't wait to get to Israel.

When I arrived at camp on a blazing hot Wednesday, I was shocked by the welcome sight of smiling and laughing children exiting the bus. I realized then that there would be no need to warm the campers' hearts, since they were already larger and warmer than I could ever have imagined.

Camp Koby, located this year at Kibbutz Tzaelim and Kibbutz Gvulot in the Negev, is one of the happiest places on earth. Not once in my 10-day experience did I encounter a temper tantrum or a feud between campers. There was an enormous amount of compassion and love flooding through the camp when I was there.

Appreciation and acknowledgement induce a sense of happiness in people, so it's no surprise that Camp Koby is such a happy place. The campers showed a mature sense of gratitude for both their friends and their counsellors. I experienced this first-hand when I received an overwhelming hug and "thank you" for simply accompanying a camper back to his bunk. He was afraid of being alone after his father was murdered, and my seemingly ordinary act of common courtesy made all the difference to him.

The fact that all the kids at Camp Koby have lost a loved one to terror allows each of them to express their emotions without fear of judgment by their peers. In normal society, these campers would not openly express how they feel, for fear of being judged. But at Camp Koby, their common experiences not only created a unique sense of comfort and closeness between them, it also led to the creation of strong friendships. The kids long for this aspect of camp during the rest of the year, and it adds to their anticipation before they get there, and to their joy when they arrive.

The need for Camp Koby became evident to me once I had completed my term as a counsellor there. Camp Koby allows the kids to deal with their losses and experience a community where they feel truly at home. The campers made me feel part of their special family, and they'll remain in my heart forever.

The power of forgiveness

On Apology* by Aaron Lazare, Oxford University Press.

Books
Bernard Baskin

In 1922, Walter Rathenau, the Jewish minister of foreign affairs for Germany, was murdered by three right-wing German terrorists. It was widely believed that anti-Semitism was a motive for the murder. Two of them were captured and committed suicide before they could go to trial. The remaining prisoner was Ernst Werner Techow, a 21-year-old man from a distinguished family. He was sentenced to 15 years in prison.

Within days after the murder, Rathenau's mother wrote the following letter to Techow's mother: "Say to your son that in the name and spirit of him he has murdered, I forgive, even as God may forgive, if before an earthly judge he make a full and frank confession of his guilt and before a heavenly one repent… May these words give peace to your soul." Her letter was read in court at the trial.

When Techow was released five years later for good behaviour, he immediately enlisted in the Foreign Legion and was decorated for his military activities, which included capturing 24 Nazis. As a result of the letter – while in prison, and after his release – Techow studied Hebrew and became a student of Jewish culture. He acknowledged how much he admired Frau Rathenau for writing the letter to his mother and expressed the hope that he could make up, in some way, for his past behaviour. In 1940, Techow resigned from the Foreign Legion and found his way to Marseilles, where he helped more than 700 Jews escape to Spain. Thus Frau Rathenau's forgiveness had at last borne its fruits.

The author of On Apology, a professor of psychology, is convinced that there is a vital connection between sincere apology and successful repentance and adduces the Techow case as a prime example.

Another of the author's examples is the remarkable address that Richard von Weizsaecker, the former president of the Federal Republic of Germany, gave to the Bundestag commemorating the 40th anniversary of the war in Europe.

Von Weizsaecker said, "In particular we commemorate the six million Jews who were murdered in German concentration camps… all nations who suffered in the war, especially the countless citizens of the Soviet Union and Poland who lost their lives… the Sinti and Romany Gypsies, the homosexuals and the mentally ill… the people who had to die for their religious or political beliefs… the hostages who were executed. We recall the victims of the resistance movements in all countries occupied by us. As Germans, we pay homage to the victims of the German resistance."

His description of German atrocities in a specific and unflinching manner concludes with the words, "There can be no reconciliation without remembrance."

Is it possible to forgive the Nazi murderers? Rabbi Abraham Heschel, when he was asked this question, replied that only the victims are able to forgive. We do not have a proxy vote to forgive in their stead.

It seems true that those who do not forgive are those who are least capable of changing the circumstances of their lives. In this sense, forgiveness is a shrewd and practical strategy for a person or a nation to pursue, for forgiveness frees the forgiver. The willingness and ability to apologize and seek forgiveness is the hallmark of our basic humanity.

On Apology is a sensitive and perceptive analysis on a complex and vital subject that is of a special interest at this season of repentance and forgiveness.

Yom Kippur and tshuvah

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Perhaps the most moving moment of the High Holy Day services is the recitation of Unetaneh Tokef prayer: "On New Year's Day the decree is inscribed/ And on the Day of Atonement it is sealed/ How many shall pass away and how many shall be born/ Who shall live and who shall die." [http://tinyurl.com/2upf3]

After enumerating several horrible ways to perish, the congregation exclaims, "But tshuvah and tfillah and tzedakah remove the evil of the decree!" Today, the road to tshuvah is on the World Wide Web.

Make a mistake? You're in good company. As Lori Palatnik points out, "Everyone makes mistakes. The Torah is filled with people – great people – who made mistakes… Our forefathers and foremothers were human, made of flesh and blood. Indeed, what made them great was not that they led perfect lives, but that they learned from their mistakes. When they fell, they got up and continued on the path toward God." And the way to do it is not to be paralyzed by guilt. Despite all the Jewish stereotypes to the contrary, Palatnik explains that "guilt is not a Jewish idea because guilt is paralyzing and self-absorbing. The Jewish view is to use mistakes to grow forward." [http://tinyurl.com/cg3pe]

In her article New Year's Resolutions, Robin Treistman writes that "repentance" really isn't a very good translation for tshuvah. She prefers "returning – returning to the desirable path." [www.wzo.org.il/encountr/resolute.htm] How to get back on the path? Aish HaTorah takes a very practical tack in its article, Tshuvah: Dry Cleaning for the Soul. It explains that the process of tshuvah involves four steps: regret, cessation, confession and resolution. [http://tinyurl.com/92t4a]

Sounds simple enough but the road to tshuvah really does require more thought, study and work than you can find reading a single article. Torah.org has prepared an in-depth tshuvah class, The Gates of Repentance, based on the seminal Jewish works in this area: Rabbeinu Yonah's The Gates of Repentance, Bachya Ibn Pakudah's The Duties of the Heart, Rabbi Moshe Chaim Luzzatto's The Path of the Just and the Rambam's Eight Chapters. You can either follow the chapters online or subscribe to this Spiritual Excellence series and receive the classes by e-mail. [http://tinyurl.com/d9jzr]

There are a couple of blogs – the "Velveteen Rabbi" [http://tinyurl.com/8rote] and Rabbi Lazer Brody's Lazer Beams – that focus on tshuvah. I particularly like Lazer Beam's real problems from real people. Kenny from Long Island writes, "I've made several false starts at tshuvah, but I always dump the idea after a few weeks because every time I try, I get a hassle from all different directions (parents, friends, etc.). But the more I read your blog, the more I want to make tshuvah and the lousier I feel about not making tshuvah. Got any suggestions?" The rabbi does but you'll have to go his site to find out what they are. [http://tinyurl.com/czwwo]

How do you convey concepts of tshuvah to young people? The Jewish Theological Seminary site has some suggestions. [http://tinyurl.com/akk3h] In order to get kids to understand that tshuvah is not an obscure theory but something very practical, the site lists several common misdeeds (e.g. Jonathan borrowed his brother's Frisbee without asking and lost it; Abby called someone names in school.) It then asks kids to explain how they would achieve tshuvah. Also check out Tshuvah for Kids at Reconstruction Today [www2.jrf.org/rt/article.php?id=127] and Beyond Apples in Honey: Teaching repentance to kids. [http://tinyurl.com/7moyg]

The journey of achieving tshuvah is so onerous that Yom Kippur is viewed as a solemn, sombre day. Aaron Ross has a fascinating essay on tshuvah in which he explains why Jewish tradition actually looks at Yom Kippur as one of the happiest days in the Jewish calendar [http://chaburas.org/teshuva.html]. He says that throughout the entire day of Yom Kippur, we are unsure whether forgiveness will be granted. "However, once the day is done, once we have drained every ounce of our energies into the activities of the day… we are confident that our prayers have worked and that we have been pardoned in the heavenly court. It is then that we can shout and sing, and it is at that moment that the totality of the day culminates in a moment of supreme joy."

Baby Boom generation on display at Baycrest

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Baby Boom generation has arrived at Toronto's Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care – as the subject of a new exhibit that opened Sept. 18.

"Get Back: The Boomer Experience," which runs for a year on the centre's main floor Baycrest Heritage Museum, is subtitled "Growing up Jewish in the '50s, '60s and '70s." It evolved from an idea proposed by local artist Ian Leventhal, 54, the exhibit's designer and planning consultant. He contributed some of the items on display, including his childhood Minibrix set, adjacent to a Shabbat dinner vignette based on an early 1950s photograph taken at his wife's grandparents' house.

Leventhal painted the backdrop for the scene, and Elaine Glassman created papier-mâché figures. The display is included in the 1950s part of the exhibit, which represents childhood and innocence, Leventhal said. The '60s "Youthquake" part is devoted to adolescence, and the '70s represents maturity in the form of romance, love and marriage.

Leventhal pointed out the fun, garish colours in typical wedding gifts of the era, like pink and orange towels, and an orange fondue pot. "Our first kitchen was bright orange," he recalls. "One thing about the '70s – it was bright."

Toronto foodies will appreciate the carefully reproduced bar mitzvah cake made by pastry maestro Dufflet Rosenberg. Above it is a picture of her as a child with her brother at his bar mitzvah – and, of course, the cake.

Other contributors of memorabilia include magazine editor Bonnie Fuller, actor Rick Moranis and Jeanne Beker of Fashion Television.

There were also contributions from elderly Baycrest clients, noted museum co-ordinator Pat Dickinson in a news release. "One of them was a professional knitter and we have on display the hand-knitted dress that she wore to her son's wedding in the 1970s."

It's a "curious feeling" to see Hebrew-school report cards, camp pictures and Carnaby Street platform shoes on display as artifacts, Leventhal – who wore a tie-dyed T-shirt for the occasion – said in a speech at the opening. "Yes we actually wore those funny clothes, and when we had hair, it was way out there."

The museum, with 900 items in its permanent Judaica collection, is believed to be the only one in Canada located in a geriatric facility. The boomer display is its 17th special exhibit.

'Vocal locals' can help Israel, official says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Diaspora Jews can help Israel by becoming "vocal locals," says David Baker, senior foreign press co-ordinator for the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem.

"Put your thoughts in words. Contribute original pieces to the media or respond to op/ed pieces. You can help Israel by getting our story out there," he told a gathering of the Toronto Hadassah-WIZO president's forum last week.

Baker, a New York City native who made aliyah 20 years ago, also spoke to Hadassah-WIZO members in Edmonton, Calgary and Vancouver.

He told the Toronto group that Diaspora Jews must try to get Israel's position accurately portrayed in the media.

"When you see an inaccurate report, dash off a fax or e-mail to the news director. Let them know they're journalistically responsible," he said.

"No media bashing, though. They'll take that and use it [for their own ends]."

Local Israeli consulates, he said, should be the main source of information about the situation in Israel. "When you want an update, call the local consulate. That will keep you on the same page [as Israel]."

David Baker

Baker, who has worked in the Prime Minister's Office since 2000, said the foreign news media has an insatiable appetite for news from Israel. "With 400 permanent foreign journalists stationed there, they trail only Washington and Moscow.

"There are also many foreign journalists who come for short term assignments. During last month's disengagement from Gaza, they came in tremendous numbers."

Baker's office, which works closely with the Foreign Ministry to try to speak with "one voice," endeavours to provide fast responses to queries, he said, "but there are many pitfalls and stumbling blocks. We respond quickly and hope that [the media] use it, but we often get bumped. We don't determine what gets on TV [or in the papers.]

"A certain number of editors and reporters have contributed to a misunderstanding of Israel by being biased in the purest sense. They'll have you believe from the outset that Israel is a military giant that is willing to squash a weaker entity."

This storyline helps sells papers, he said. "Too many times, a real report takes a back seat to a sensational story. There is [too often] a knee-jerk tendency to report the juiciest story, not the basic truth."

A story about how Israeli civilians always have to be on the lookout for terrorists is less vivid than an image of the Israel Defence Forces entering a Palestinian town. "How can the international media pass up that image?"

But that's the price Israelis pay for living in an open society, Baker said. "We can control our readiness to get to the media, but we cannot control what gets on."

By becoming "vocal locals," he added, Diaspora Jews can also promote images of Israel that go beyond the Arab-Israeli conflict. "It is a country that is rich in high tech. We need to unearth the great secret that is Israel."

On another matter, Baker urged the group to explore the possibility of living in Israel. "Aliyah is essential to the Jewish people. Take part in the country day by day, brick by brick."

Democratization: Is It For Real?

Democratization of previously undemocratic or tyrannical societies is an idea in the air and an emerging reality in places on the ground. For some, this phenomenon is revolutionary and important; for others, democratization is American hubris at its worst. This series, featuring some of the most compelling voices of our time, examines this explosive and significant issue.

New congregation replaces defunct Riverdale Shul

BY BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The Riverdale Shul, an Orthodox congregation on the Danforth that closed in June due to financial problems, is in the process of being reborn.

Housed in a small space adjacent to a member's home at 866 Pape Ave., the fledgling synagogue was to hold its inaugural services on Rosh Hashanah.

Emile Levy, president of Mastercraft Shutters and a major financial backer of the Riverdale Shul, said he's prepared to donate the 17 x 20-foot space, which can hold up to 40 people, long-term after the holidays, "if the commitment on the part of the members is there."

Saying it's "a miracle the congregation is being revived," Martin Solomon, former chazzan of the Riverdale Shul, is cautiously optimistic about its future.

"We're all afraid to say out loud what we all hope for," Solomon said. "The hope is that this will carry on after the High Holidays."

The Riverdale Shul's closing due to financial problems was a huge loss for many people, Solomon said. "It was such a welcoming place. But we couldn't afford to pay the rent."

Documentary filmmaker and shul co-founder Simcha Jacobovici had been able to raise enough money to finance the congregation through gala screenings of his films, but that support dissipated when he moved to Thornhill with his family three years ago.

The synagogue was set to close last December, when it was about $15,000 in debt and couldn't afford its monthly rent of $1,700 for space above a Danforth storefront.

Community meetings held last winter in a last-ditch effort to save the shul gave the congregation a fiscal lifeline until the spring, but in the end, donors such as realtor Brent Pearlman and Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers, a key shul supporter since its inception in 1994, couldn't save it.

"The Torah was returned to Hillel [of Greater Toronto] – we had it on loan. The furniture was cleared out. [We had] nothing left. The congregation dispersed," said Solomon, who had been involved with the shul for three years.

He called the congregation his "second family," adding that other members shared the same kind of attachment to the shul.

About 120 people used to attend its High Holy Day services and were affiliated with the shul, which mainly attracted Jews living east of Jarvis Street in places such as Cabbagetown and the Beaches. A core group of 20 to 25 people attended Shabbat services regularly and participated in programs.

Ori Carmona, the shul's former baal koreh, was the catalyst for re-establishing the congregation, Solomon said.

"He approached me at the end of August and said he didn't feel right going anywhere else for Rosh Hashanah," Solomon said. "He hadn't found a new spiritual home."

He had planned to convert what was originally a garage into showroom space for his business. It had already been zoned for commercial use, he explained.

"I decided to postpone building a showroom. I had the opportunity to put the shul together for the members. I wanted to provide a place for people to daven who could not afford to pay for High Holy Day services," he said.

"Right now, it's a makeshift shul. We have a Torah. We have prayer books and we have a chazzan."

The community has been very supportive, Solomon said. "At this point, a congregation is lending us a Torah. We started with nothing. Now, books are appearing… pictures, flowers and food.

"We're even putting in a kosher kitchen next to the sanctuary."

Levy's generosity has spurred many former congregants to reconnect with the shul, Solomon added.

"When members of the community heard there was a possibility that we could pray together again, they went to work. They have transformed the room into a beautiful sanctuary," he said.

"They yearned for the old community. I get calls daily. Someone will say, 'I just heard that something is happening. Can I come?'"

"I'm saying 'yes' to everybody, because Hashem makes a space as big as it needs to be for all those who would come together to form His congregation."

However, some members, such as Steve Jackson, the driving forced behind the Riverdale Shul for three years prior to its closing, are no longer involved, Solomon said.

"Steve kept the shul going for years beyond what people thought was financially possible. Like a lot of other members of the congregation, Steve has moved on and no longer lives in Riverdale."

Comper, Switzer honoured

The Canadian Council of Christians and Jews (CCCJ) held a reception last week for philanthropist Elizabeth Comper and broadcaster Jay Switzer, the recipients of the group's 2005 Human Relations Award.

The reception, held at the CHUM building, aimed to publicize the CCCJ's 58th anniversary and its awards dinner, to be held Nov. 29 at the Fairmont Royal York, where Comper and Switzer will officially receive their prizes.

"It's important to highlight the work of those people who have done so much to promote cultural acceptance and understanding among Canadians," said Amanda Sherrington, the CCCJ's national executive director. "Elizabeth Comper and Jay Switzer epitomize that commitment to diversity."

Comper, a former primary school teacher in Etobicoke, has fundraised and volunteered for many organizations across Canada. Earlier this year, she and her husband Tony Comper, president and CEO of BMO Financial Group, launched FAST, a coalition of non-Jewish business and community leaders that aims to fight anti-Semitism and racism.

She called the CCCJ award a "great honour" because "it identifies me with an organization I have admired and been thankful for as long as I can remember. Its whole reason for being is to bring people together and appreciate what, as human beings, we all have in common."

Switzer, president and CEO of CHUM Limited, is a respected member of the Canadian media industry and known for his commitment to diversity.

"It's a privilege to be recognized by the CCCJ, an organization that has done so much for the people of Canada," Switzer said.

Marvid Poultry back in business

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Marvid Poultry is back in business, but it's facing a potentially more competitive market for kosher chickens.

Last March, owner Moishe Friedman announced that Marvid – for years Montreal's largest slaughterer and processor of kosher poultry, with a near-monopoly in the local market – was shutting down and closing its east-end plant after an almost seven-month-long strike by 90 workers from the Confédération des syndicats nationaux (CSN).

Now, not only has Marvid been operating full throttle since August in the run-up to the High Holy Days – the apparent result of a new willingness by both sides to let a third party mediate outstanding issues – but the local market has been opened on an apparently indefinite basis to outside suppliers such as Chai Kosher Poultry of Toronto, one of the processors that made up for local shortfalls in supply during the strike.

Such imports were not permitted previously by the Vaad Ha'ir (Jewish Community Council), Montreal's kosher certification body, which barred MK-certified establishments from importing poultry. (A ban still applies to beef and veal.)

"The Vaad continues to allow Chai and [Iowa-based] Rubashkin to supply chickens in Montreal on an ongoing basis," Rabbi Saul Emanuel, the Va'ad Ha'ir executive director, said in an e-mailed statement.

"The Vaad had no role in settling the [Marvid] dispute. We are happy that the dispute is over and that the local producer Marvid is back in business to supply the market."

Friedman said that since Marvid restarted full operations, his poultry prices have dropped "25 to 30 per cent," which has obliged other suppliers to follow suit.

He told The CJN that he felt "very comfortable" with the decision by both sides to have an as-yet-unnamed arbitrator mediate outstanding issues.

According to CSN negotiator Claude Bégin, those issues include hours, salaries and employees' ability to vary duties within the plant.

"We always stayed in contact [with Marvid]," Bégin said. "It is good for everyone to get back to work."

Friedman said both sides have agreed to a "minimum" and "maximum" regarding salaries, and the arbitrator will make a decision within those bounds.

In that sense, "we already know what will be acceptable," Friedman said.

Once a new collective agreement is signed – the previous one expired at the end of 2003 – it will be in effect for five years, Friedman said.

The strike began just before Rosh Hashanah last year after Marvid started a second production line that reduced some employees' hours.

Friedman said that although the plant officially closed last March, Marvid never stopped operating entirely.

Although no local slaughter was taking place, Friedman said Marvid repackaged imported U.S. poultry under the Marvid name and continued to "ship it out."

Friedman did not specify what brought Marvid and its workers back to the table, but sources with knowledge of the situation told The CJN that one reason was that more than one shipment from Pennsylvania-based Empire Kosher Poultry destined for repackaging at Marvid was turned back at the border by Canadian inspectors.

Friedman, sources said, became fed up and that motivated him to enter into new talks with the workers.

Friedman said that although he is not accustomed to seeing other kosher poultry suppliers in the city, he's not worried, because local slaughter permits timely delivery of fresh product.

"I'm not used to competition, but at the same time it brings out our strengths and qualities," he said. "We can fill orders the same day. Other suppliers can't.

"We haven't seen any drop in volume and people like our product very much."

Thunder Bay endowment fund launched

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A new endowment fund to sustain the small and dwindling Jewish community of Thunder Bay has been established by expatriates who now live in Winnipeg.

On Sept. 26, about 200 people gathered at the Berney Theatre at the Asper Jewish Community Campus in Winnipeg for an evening of nostalgia featuring David Letterman's bandleader and ex-Thunder Bay resident Paul Shaffer, and to inaugurate the Shaarey Shomayim of Fort William Endowment Fund.

The fund, to be administered by the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba (JFM), will finance ongoing cultural programming for the 30 Jewish families who still live in Thunder Bay and maintain the Shaarey Shomayim cemetery in perpetuity.

The JFM would not disclose how much has been raised so far by the new endowment fund, but it said its first two major donors are Shaffer and Syd Halter, the current Thunder Bay Jewish community president and a former chairman of Lakehead University's board of governors.

In his opening remarks, Larry Hurtig, a former Thunder Bay resident and chair of Winnipeg's Jews of Thunder Bay Planning Committee (he's also a past president of Winnipeg's Jewish federation), recounted the history of Thunder Bay's Jewish community.

The first Jewish immigrant to the Fort William/Port Arthur area (Thunder Bay was formed by a merger of the two towns in 1970) arrived in the late 1890s. In 1911, there were 343 Jews in the area, and by the 1930s and 40s, the population had grown to 150 families.

"Jewish life in Thunder Bay revolved around the [Shaarey Shomayim Synagogue] and the B'nai Brith Hall nearby," Hurtig recalled. "We had a rabbi and a kosher butcher. We were an active community. We had weekly socials and dances in the B'nai Brith hall when I was growing up."

Hurtig and four other former Thunder Bay Jews who now live in Winnipeg – Pat Brody, Harvey and Lou Cogan and Michael Helper – have formed the planning committee and established a permanent exhibit of Thunder Bay Jewish history at the Marion and Ed Vickar Jewish Museum of Western Canada on the Asper Campus.

The endowment fund is the next step in preserving the community's future and past, Hurtig said.

Halter told the gathering that if at some point Thunder Bay can no longer support its synagogue, proceeds from a sale of Shaarey Shomayim's building would go to the endowment fund, which is named after the shul.

He also noted that the community's 100th anniversary is coming up in three years, and he tried to gauge interest among audience members as to how many people might attend a reunion to coincide with the milestone.

Hurtig noted that Thunder Bay's Jewish community has produced several prominent people and families.

Among them are the late Bora Laskin, the first and only Jewish chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada; former Canadian welterweight boxing champion Oren Safir; the Barish family, who built Dickie Dee Ice Cream into an international business; Bernard Shaffer, a former president of the Ontario branch of the Canadian Bar Association, who died in August 2004 at age 90; and, of course, Shaffer's famous son, Paul, the longtime musical director for late-night TV host David Letterman and the evening's guest of honour.

Shaffer led the audience in reminiscences about Jewish Thunder Bay and played a number on the piano. He has donated family memorabilia to the Thunder Bay exhibit and made a donation to the new endowment fund.

Yiddish library, resource centre opens

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish community this month celebrated the opening of Dos Yiddish Vinkel (The Yiddish Corner), its new Yiddish language library and resource centre.

"We have waited a long time for this day," said Oscar Antel, chair of the opening ceremonies on Sept. 18 and one of the major proponents behind the creation of the Vinkel, which is located in the Kaufman-Silverberg Library at the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

For those of us (including this writer) who were part of the struggle to keep the Jewish Public Library open in its final years, it was satisfying to see some of the former library's Yiddish books properly catalogued and available to the public again.

The Jewish Public Library was an institution in north Winnipeg for 80 years. Over that time, the library built up a collection of 15,000 to 20,000 Yiddish, Hebrew and English books. The JPL also had a good selection of newspapers, magazines and videos, and a reading room that could also be used for programming.

The room was used less and less over the years as the number of Yiddish-speakers in the community decreased. When the new campus was opened in the fall of 1997 with the new Kaufman-Silverberg Library, the community leadership determined that the JPL should be merged into the new library.

The JPL board reluctantly agreed. Many of the old library's books had been donated to libraries in the United States, England and elsewhere in Canada, but a core collection of about 5,000 Yiddish books was transferred to the new library.

Dos Yiddish Vinkel has a large table and chairs surrounded by shelving with space for about 3,000 books. The books will be rotated. The room also has Yiddish newspapers, videos and journals and a bust of Shalom Aleichem.

It took so many years to open the Vinkel, Antel noted, because it took that long to properly catalogue the books.

Noted Canadian Yiddish author Chava Rosenfarb was the guest speaker at the opening program of Dos Yiddish Vinkel, attended by about 150 people.

Rosenfarb originally wrote The Tree of Life trilogy, her account of the Holocaust, in fictional form, in Yiddish. The trilogy is being published in English by the University of Wisconsin Press. The first volume was released last year, and the second is coming out this fall. Rosenfarb recounted her experiences in the Lodz Ghetto and concentration camps and spoke about her challenges in writing about the Holocaust.

As to the new Yiddish Vinkel, she said she hoped it would become a Yiddish cultural centre not only for Winnipeg but for all of Canada.

Alberta and Israel work to secure water resources

By NEIL LOOMER
Special to The CJN

EDMONTON — The Jewish National Fund and Alberta government recently wrapped up a research mission to Israel with a commitment by Alberta's Transportation and Infrastructure Minister Lyle Oberg to invest in projects that will secure scarce water resources in Israel and Alberta.

The Alberta delegation included Oberg, Medicine Hat Progressive Conservative MLA Len Mitzel and representatives from the University of Lethbridge, the department of environment and the Alberta Irrigation Projects Association. They visited waste-treatment centres, pumping stations, reservoirs and desalinization plants in a seven-day tour during the first week of September, designed to show how effectively Israel manages its water resources.

Presentations took place at the Weizmann Institute, the Technion and Ben-Gurion University. Participants were shown the latest innovations being developed to preserve water and develop new methods of agriculture.

While northern Alberta is rich in water resources, the southern part of the province has arid conditions that are similar to Israel's. For the first time, the government is faced with restricting water usage for farmers and ranchers and is looking to Israel to see how limited water resources can be better managed.

By investing up to a million dollars in Israel through the JNF, Alberta hopes to gain expertise in the treatment and use of recycled water, effective use of reservoirs and growing crops with less irrigated water.

Mission organized in part by Jewish National Fund

Alberta's experts were impressed with Israeli technology, which allows it to recover water for reuse. Treated sewage is not dumped into the Mediterranean Sea and currently 64 per cent is recovered, treated and used for agricultural irrigation. The main source of fresh water in Israel is from Lake Kinneret, but this water must be treated due to the high salinity content. It is then distributed throughout the country on a series of pipelines operated by the National Water Carrier.

The mission was organized by JNF Prairie representative Rami Kleinmann, who enlisted the help of well-known Canadian and Israeli businessman Nathan Jacobson. Jacobson arranged many of the meetings between Israeli dignitaries and the Albertans.

A highlight of the mission was a visit to the office of Israeli Vice-Premier Shimon Peres. Peres reiterated the importance of water conservation in Israel's future, saying that the lack of water is potentially more dangerous than any disease. He also stated that water could be the key to peace in the Middle East.

In his response to Peres, Oberg said that Alberta, which has more proven oil reserves than Saudi Arabia, is fortunate to have the money to invest in research to prevent the province's water crisis from getting worse.

Peres and Oberg discussed the promise that new research in nanotechnology holds for future innovations and promised to look into ways that Israel and Alberta, which is the home of the Canadian Centre for Nanotechnology, could work together.

At the end of the mission, a document titled the Alberta-JNF Conservation Research Project was signed by Oberg, Joe Rabinovitch, executive vice-president of JNF Canada and Yehiel Leket, world chair of the Jewish National Fund.

The agreement states that the two parties will mutually fund and explore research relating to innovative design, construction and rehabilitation of water conservation and irrigation facilities.

'Terrible blow to Jewish women'

Bruker, who launched the civil suit in 1989, had been seeking $1.35 million.

Mass' 2003 judgment was hailed by advocates for the rights of agunot, both as a deterrent to recalcitrant husbands and significant to agunot who were divorced before 1990 when the divorce act was amended.

Bruker's lawyer, Allan Stein, said the Court of Appeal judgment renders the amendment to the Divorce Act "with no legal consequences." In late 1990, Bruker filed an affidavit under the amendment in the record of the divorce case. She and Marcovitz married in 1969.

"This puts us back another 20 years. It's a terrible blow to Jewish women," Stein said.

He intends to ask the Department of Justice to intervene with him in seeking leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Marcovitz's lawyer Anne-France Goldwater, however, said the ruling is a good decision because it reinforces that courts "cannot interfere in matters of faith and conscience." She also thinks it will discourage ex-couples from trying to sue one another for promises they may make as addenda to their divorce that are too personal for the courts to deal with.

> Courts 'cannot interfere in matters of faith and conscience'

Goldwater had argued that the case was not justiciable and, although it was never adjudicated, claimed the Divorce Act amendment was unconstitutional.

Court of Appeal justice Allan Hilton, who wrote the judgment, states: "Although one cannot help but be sympathetic to the plight of a Jewish woman whose former husband delays or denies her a get, whether or not he has entered into a prenuptial agreement to do so or [as in this case] in the context of a consent to corollary relief, I have concluded that the substance of the former husband's obligation is religious in nature, irrespective of the form in which the obligation is stated and, accordingly, that an alleged breach of the obligation is not enforceable by the secular courts to obtain damages or specific performance.

"Manifestly, it is not the role of secular courts to palliate the discriminatory effect of the absence of a get on a Jewish woman who wants to obtain one, any more than it would be appropriate for secular courts, in an extra-contractual context, to become involved in similar disputes involving other religions where unequal treatment is the fate of women in terms of their access to positions in the clergy, or…the fate reserved for same-sex couples being denied the right to marry in religious ceremonies."

Hilton says that even though Marcovitz willingly gave his consent, his obligation to abide by the agreement is at most a moral one.

He cites the 2004 Supreme Court of Canada decision permitting Jewish co-owners of the Sanctuaire du Mont Royal condominiums to erect sukkot on their balconies, despite the fact they had signed agreements to not construct on or decorate their balconies.

"If a Jewish man could not be presumed to have contractually waived his freedom of religion and thus be entitled to erect a sukkah on his balcony, how can Mr. Marcovitz be presumed to have waived his right not to appear before a rabbinical tribunal for the granting of a get as a matter of religious conscience, and who is this court to tell him that he had a civil duty to perform irrespective of the rights he might have according to his religious beliefs?"

Hilton says the court should not interfere in the right of Marcovitz, described as a practising Orthodox Jew, to execute his religious beliefs or duties "as he sees fit."

He further states that the get could not have been issued anyway, because rabbinical authorities would have considered Marcovitz to have been coerced. Marcovitz would have had to renounce his previous consent before the rabbis, and "stipulate that what he was then doing was voluntary," Hilton concluded from the evidence.

As for the "imperfect" Divorce Act amendment, Hilton says it was of no use to Bruker, because Marcovitz did not initiate a separate motion, as is required to implement this provision – a point Stein strongly disagrees with.

In any event, all parties agreed eventually to, in Hilton's words, "proceed… as if the impugned provision did not exist."

Stein says Hilton erred in his understanding of Judaism, because the three rabbis who appeared as experts at the trial agreed that Marcovitz had indeed freely given his consent to appear before the rabbinical court.

They were, for Marcovitz, Rabbi Mendel Epstein of New York, author of A Woman's Guide to the Get Process; and, for Bruker, Montreal modern Orthodox rabbis Howard Joseph and Michael Kramer.

In 2003, Mass gave a contradictory opinion. He wrote: "Once there is a civil contract, even if its object relates to religious obligations, it is justiciable and within the jurisdiction of the civil court… Simply put, a valid civil obligation with religious undertones was created."

Documentary on Hamas serious, but flawed

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

At the beginning of the documentary Hamas: Behind the Mask, broadcast on The Passionate Eye, CBC, Sept. 22, the narrator announces its aim: to take "a journey inside Hamas at a transformative time on its way to becoming a political power with much more influence than the gun."

Had the documentary actually focused on this aim, it might have contributed more to the viewers' understanding of this critical subject. Instead, the documentary concentrated on Hamas' battles with Israel during Palestinian violence from 2000 to 2004.

Documentaries, almost by definition, present a point of view, and Hamas: Behind the Mask certainly fits this mould. Most of the film showed the Palestinians suffering under Israeli occupation. While the filmmaker did note that "Unlike Hamas, Israeli operations do not target civilians," emotional scenes of Palestinians weeping after IDF strikes, of wounded Palestinian children, and of destroyed houses and buildings left the impression of wanton Israeli aggression.

The filmmakers did seek some balance by interviewing Israelis, including former Shin Bet head Ami Ayalon and Lt.-Col. Yohenan Tsoref, identified as a counter-terrorism expert. There were also a few brief scenes showing a burnt-out Israeli bus after a suicide attack and an interview with an Israeli family in Sderot whose daughter was killed in a rocket attack.

But the emphasis was on Palestinian suffering – with the implied (even if unintended) message that the terrorism inflicted on Israeli civilians was the outcome of the ill-treatment of Palestinians by the Israeli occupying force and the despair that results.

Tsoref even contributed to this perception by repeatedly claiming, without context or explanation, that Hamas was only seeking "revenge." Missing entirely was an alternative thesis: that Hamas is using violence and terrorism as a strategic weapon in its aim to destroy Israel, and that it rejects any possibility of accommodation through negotiations.

The documentary did cite the Hamas covenant: "To destroy the state of Israel through Jihad; to raise the banner of Islam over every inch of Palestine." Yet it concluded with an inconsistent and too-brief look at how Hamas might be evolving into a political party willing to compromise with Israel.

After spending most of its time depicting events in 2004 and earlier, the documentary quickly ran through current developments: Hamas' recent successes in Palestinian municipal elections, Israel's withdrawal from Gaza in August 2005, and a reference to Palestinian legislative elections scheduled for January 2006.

The narrator speaks baldly of a shift: "Hamas is in the process of rewriting its original covenant. They no longer speak of liberating every inch of Palestine, at least not now."

This claim is not accurate. Isolated Hamas individuals have recently raised the possibility of rewriting the covenant, but no official action has been taken. Principal spokespeople still insist that Jewish sovereign existence is anathema to Hamas. The filmmakers acknowledge that Hamas leader Khaled Meshaal, based in Damascus, "vows that armed resistance will remain an option."

Missing entirely is any reference to Hamas' relationship with the Palestinian Authority (PA) and to the challenge it poses to PA President Mahmoud Abbas' declaration that there will be only one authority and "only one gun."

If Hamas runs – as it intends to – in the upcoming national Palestinian elections but refuses to disarm (as required by the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan), what is the future of the PA, the Palestinians and the possibility of Palestinian democracy? Such questions need to be addressed in any consideration of Hamas' purported "transformation" into a political party.

Despite its deficiencies, Hamas: Behind the Mask makes a serious effort to examine what Hamas is and tries – within its point of view – to be fair to Israel. The documentary is neither anti-Israel nor does it give succor to Hamas. But it could have been stronger by probing more deeply.

Hillel struggles to get Jewish youth involved out west

By DAVE GORDON
Special to the CJN

As Jewish students filed into university lectures this fall, local Hillels geared up to help young Jews "do Jewish" on campus. For smaller campuses out west, the struggle for Jewish leaders to bring together Jewish students is a bit different from in the bigger centres in eastern Canada.

With fewer students and fewer resources, Jewish organizations on smaller campuses often have to be more creative to get the word out about Jewish programs.

Last year, Racheli and Ran Zarivach, aged 26 and 28 respectively, were hired to run Jewish student programming in Saskatoon.

Although they work hard to provide programs that Jewish youth can enjoy, Ran said, "We are a very small Jewish student association. It's not big enough to do everything we want for young adults."

There are about 500 Jews in Saskatoon, one-tenth of whom are between 18 and 35, and half of them are locals, he added.

"Our biggest challenge is to bring as much Jewish culture and Israel to the heart of the people here, especially among the Jewish students."

Josh Margo, the Hillel director in Calgary, is the young adult programming co-ordinator. He said most of the 300 Jewish students at campus are locals and they have grown up together since birth.

"They are a very tight knit group," Margo said.

Only a dozen or so are out of town students.

"Many of the out-of-town students can be here for three years and never even know that there is a Jewish community. Some actually make an effort to see what's going. But it is not easy to track them down. Most are graduate students who are very busy with their studies."

Margo said that the biggest challenge is to lure students to become involved with Hillel and to get more students out to programs.

"We can run programs every week but if no students are coming out then we are not being effective," he said.

"It is easy to discuss these ideas but not so easy to manufacture them on campus. The other issue that makes or breaks a program is the attitude that precedes the program. If we are able to portray positive and uplifting attitude, then any program that seems that it won't do well can be switched around and become effective, just by the attitude taken by the leaders."

The Calgary Jewish Community Council does not give money based per student but rather per program.

"If they see that we are running more effective programs… then they will hopefully give us more funding," Margo said.

But sometimes money isn't always the solution, he admitted.

"Although more money is great, sometimes all you need is the right amount of time to run the best programs. We should not be thinking about money when starting to organize a program. First come up with the great idea and then plan it – afterwards worry about who will fund it. If we had more or less money, we would still need to come up with the new creative ideas to spend the money."

In Winnipeg, the Jewish Federation gives a set budget per year and the students have free membership as long as they are Jewish and between the ages of 18 and 26.

"With more money we could have more range of speakers. Speakers cost the most amount of money and therefore we can't bring in the people we want," said Jodi Koffman, the executive director of Hillel in Winnipeg.

Winnipeg is unlike most places, Koffman said, where the vast majority of the students who go to university there were born and raised there.

"The biggest challenge is apathy amongst Jewish students. Some have no interest in being a part of a Jewish organization. The way to overcome it is by putting yourself out there and introducing yourself and extending a personal invitation to a program. Most of them are just shy and need to feel more welcomed."

Scholarship helps Jewish students study in Israel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Alisa Flatow Memorial Scholarship – established by Flatow's family when she went to study in Israel 10 years ago and was killed in a terrorist attack – is accepting applications for the 2006-07 school year.

The fund, which is meant to encourage other Jewish students to study Judaism in Israel, which is what Flatow was doing when she was killed in Kfar Darom in 1995, is open to any student who is pursuing post-secondary studies.

Wally Greene, who volunteers as the administrator of the fund, said this is an opportunity Jewish students shouldn't miss."Spending a year in Israel is a life-altering experience," he said.

Students "showing academic promise in religious studies" and who need financial assistance to study in Israel are encouraged to apply for the $3,500 scholarships.

Eight students will be awarded the scholarships. The fund also offers five $750 awards.

Greene said the goal of the scholarship is "to help as many people as possible to study in Israel."

February 15, 2006, is the deadline for the completed applications.

Obituary

Cookbook legend mentored generation of foodies

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Lillian Kaplun, a leader in the field of baking, cooking and entertaining, and a maverick for women's independence, died on Sept. 19. She was 96.

Lillian Kaplun

Born in Englehart, Ont., she was one of six children in the Slotnick family, four girls and two boys. At age nine, she began experimenting with baking.

Her determination to improve her recipes, along with a tremendous drive to discover new and more modern methods, remained with her throughout her life.

The family moved many times to small communities in northern Ontario, and after her marriage to Hyman Kaplun, she moved to Timmins, Ont., and then to Vancouver.

In the 1950s, the Kapluns and their two children, Jack and Jill, moved to Toronto. They lived in an apartment building at 1840 Bathurst St., where she began her professional career.

She would bake for friends in the building who encouraged her to teach them her recipes and methods.

They would also bring their friends, and in the early 1960s, Kaplun opened a cooking school on Eglinton Avenue West. Her prime interest was baking, and she hired other women to teach cooking and entertaining.

An early feminist and well ahead of her time, Kaplun encouraged her instructors and guided them. She helped them and other women build their own careers in the culinary arts or business. Above all, she always gave others thanks and credit for their accomplishments.

Her classes went far beyond baking or cooking. She wanted women to be independent and her students enjoyed listening to her theories.

"She tried to tell women that the activities they engaged in were worthy of recognition and that women were not for staying home and not invisible," says her daughter Jill Kaplun.

She would tell her students, "If your experiment does not come out right or your tested and tried recipe should fail, dry your tears. It could have been the atmosphere, the cranky chicken who produced the egg or the time of day.

"Your next try is certain to be successful."

Many of her friends and students at the school would ask for her recipes. In the early 1960s, she published For the Love of Baking, her first of five cookbooks. She later published For the Love of Cooking, For the Love of Cooking and Baking (a compilation of her first two books, with some additions) and For the Love of Entertaining.

Her last cookbook, Lillian Kaplun's Kitchen, was published when she was in her late 80s.

Her books are still widely available, almost half a century after she published her first one. Hadassah-WIZO's Davida Chapter in Toronto sells them to raise funds.

Temi Rosenthal, who taught at Lillian Kaplun's Cooking School, told The CJN about Lillian's generous nature. "She was always prepared to give me advice. After assisting Lillian for several years, she encouraged me to open my own cooking school in my home.

"When I asked her if she wasn't afraid of the competition, she said that there is enough room in the big city for all of us."

Esther Schwartz, who also taught at Kaplun's cooking school, said, "Lillian was my mentor. She reached out to many, many women through her school, her cookbooks and her guidance to her instructors."

Kaplun was predeceased by her husband Hyman. She is survived by her children Jack and Sandy Kaplun and Jill Kaplun and Lorne Hall, four grandchildren and four great-grandchildren.

Corrections

The article titled "COR Recipes: a nutritional analysis" (CJN Sept. 22) should have said that using fresh instead of canned tomatoes will lower the sodium content of the soup. As well, the soup has 58 calories per serving. The CJN regrets the errors.

Holiday Food Ideas

New ways to use apples for a sweet holiday

By JOSIE AARONSON-GELB
Special to The CJN

This is the time of year to indulge in sweet things for a sweet year. It is the opportunity for a clean start, a fresh beginning and a chance to bite into the first new fruit of the season – the apple.

Here are some apple recipes you can try during this holiday period.

Topping
1 cup chopped pecans
1/2 cup brown sugar
1/2 lb. (2 smallish) tart apples like Granny Smith

Cake Batter
1/2 cup (1 stick) butter
1 cup sugar
2 eggs
1 cup sour cream
2 tsp. vanilla
1 1/2 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda
1/2 tsp. salt
1 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 tsp. nutmeg
2 cups flour

Preheat oven to 350. Butter a 9-in.-round cake pan. Mix 1 cup chopped pecans with 1/4 cup brown sugar and scatter evenly over bottom of cake pan. Peel, core and quarter the apples. Slice into 1/4-inch slices. Carefully arrange sliced apples on top of the pecan mixture.

Cream the butter and remaining sugar until completely blended. Beat in eggs, sour cream and vanilla until the mixture is smooth. Add baking powder, baking soda, salt, cinnamon, nutmeg and flour to the batter and mix until well blended. Pour the batter over the apples, spread evenly with a pastry spatula, and bake in the preheated oven for 55-60 minutes until firm to the touch. To test that the cake is done, insert a toothpick into the centre. It should come out clean without any batter sticking to it.

Cool the cake for at least 20 minutes in the pan. Once the cake has cooled, run a knife carefully along the edges. Put a wide-bottomed plate upside down on top of the cake pan, so that the face of the plate covers the open portion of the cake pan completely. Invert the plate and pan at the same time and place on a flat surface. Slowly raise the cake pan so that the cake stands upright on the serving plate. Serves 12.

1/4 cup low-fat ricotta cheese
3 oz. crumbled feta cheese
2 tbsp. honey
1/2 tsp. grated orange zest
1/2 cup raisins
1/4 tsp. salt
8 sheets phyllo dough
1/2 cup olive oil
12 cups mixed baby greens
2 tbsp. apple cider vinegar

In a bowl, mix together the ricotta, crumbled feta, honey, orange zest, raisins and salt until blended.

Defrost the phyllo dough according to package directions. Lay one sheet of phyllo carefully over a cutting board so the longer side is facing you. Using a pastry brush, gently paint the sheet with a light coating of olive oil. Lay a second sheet of phyllo dough on top of the first and paint with olive oil. Repeat until you have created a stack of four sheets of phyllo dough. Paint the last sheet with olive oil and carefully spoon half the ricotta filling in a strip along the vertical edge. Roll phyllo tightly around the filling, leaving the ends open. Repeat the procedure so that you have used all the ricotta filling and have two stuffed rolls.

Transfer rolls, seam side down, to a parchment lined cookie sheet. Paint the tops of the rolls with olive oil and bake in a 400-degree oven for 25 to 30 minutes or until golden brown. Cool the phyllo to room temperature.

Toss the mixed greens with apple cider vinegar and remaining 2 tbsp. of olive oil. Cut each phyllo roll into four pieces and serve on a bed of greens. Serves 8 as a hearty first course.

Dishes you can make in advance to break the fast

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

One of the key elements of a successful break-the-fast meal is being able to prepare foods in advance that require no additional prep time to get them from the fridge to the table.

The following recipes were served by family and friends who have broken their fast with my family at one time or another. All of them can be prepared in under a half an hour and made up to two days in advance.

GLORIA'S CHILLED MEDITERRANEAN PASTA SALAD

3 small very ripe tomatoes cut into wedges
1 cup kalamata or Nicoise olives, pitted and halved
1 can artichoke hearts (packed in water), quartered
1 handful baby spinach
½ cup red onion, chopped
½ to 1 tsp. dried oregano
½ tsp. dried basil
¼ cup fresh parsley, chopped
1 to 2 tsp. lemon juice
1 tsp. olive oil
salt and pepper to taste

Cook the pasta until al dente. Rinse with cold water and set aside. Meanwhile in a salad bowl combine the tomatoes, olives, artichoke hearts, spinach, red onion, oregano, basil and parsley. Mix just to combine. Add the pasta and mix gently. Drizzle the lemon juice and olive oil over the top and season with salt and pepper. Chill for at least an hour before serving so the flavours can blend. Serve cold. Serves 4 to 6.

GINGER PEANUT PASTA SALAD

8 oz. corkscrew macaroni or fine noodles
20 fresh pea pods (tips and stems removed)
1 small cucumber (quartered lengthwise and sliced)
2 medium carrots (cut into long thin strips)
1 medium yellow and/or green sweet pepper (cut into thin strips)
¾ cup thinly sliced radishes (optional)
½ cup bias-sliced green onions
3 tbsp. snipped fresh cilantro
1 recipe ginger salad dressing (below)
⅓ cup chopped peanuts

Ginger Salad Dressing:
¼ cup salad oil
3 tbsp. rice vinegar
2 tbsp. sugar
2 tbsp. soy sauce
1 tsp. grated ginger root
several dashes hot pepper sauce

Combine salad dressing ingredients in a jar. Cover and shake. Can be chilled up to 3 days.

Cook pasta according to package directions. During last 30 seconds, add the pea pods. Remove the pasta and pea pods from the heat. Drain and rinse with cold water. Place the pasta and pea pods in a bowl and add the cucumber, carrots, peppers, radishes, green onions and cilantro. Mix to combine. Add the ginger salad dressing and toss gently to coat. Cover and chill for 2-8 hours. To serve, toss the salad and sprinkle the top with the peanuts. Serves 6 to 8.

PIZZA PASTA SALAD

From the North American Olive Oil Association.

10 oz. uncooked fusilli or rotini, cooked and drained (5 cups cooked)
1⅓ cups shredded mozzarella
½ small red or yellow bell pepper, cut into small strips
¼ cup shredded Parmesan cheese
4 medium Roma tomatoes, chopped
3 green onions, sliced
2 tbsp. chopped fresh basil
½ tsp. dried marjoram leaves

Dressing:
½ cup olive oil
3 tbsp. white wine vinegar
1 tsp. minced garlic
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. crushed red pepper flakes

Cook pasta according to package directions, rinse in cold water and drain well. In large bowl, combine pasta, pepperoni, cheeses, bell pepper, tomatoes, onions, basil and marjoram; toss to mix. Set aside.

In small bowl, blend olive oil, vinegar, garlic, salt and pepper flakes. Pour over pasta mixture and toss to coat. Cover and refrigerate until serving time. Make salad up to 1 day in advance and refrigerate.

Best served at room temperature. Makes 10 to 12 servings (12 cups).

NOODLE KUGEL WITH CRANBERRIES

You can substitute golden raisins, sour cherries, or small cubes of peeled, cored apple for the cranberries.

12 oz. wide egg noodles
12 tbsp. unsalted butter, melted
5 large eggs, lightly beaten
2 cups sour cream
2 cups small curd, whole milk cottage cheese
1 cup granulated sugar
1 tbsp. vanilla extract
4 tsp. ground cinnamon
1½ cups dried cranberries

Topping
1 cup heavy whipping cream
1 tsp. ground cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. Generously butter a 9x13-in. glass baking dish with 2 tbsp. of the butter. In a large pot of boiling salted water, cook the noodles according to the package directions. Drain and toss with 4 tbsp. of the melted butter.

In a large bowl combine the eggs, sour cream, cottage cheese, sugar, vanilla, cinnamon and remaining 6 tbsp. of butter. Add the buttered pasta and the cranberries and toss well.

Transfer the noodle mixture to the baking dish. Drizzle the cream over the noodles and sprinkle with cinnamon. Bake until the top is golden, the sides are bubbling, and the centre is set, about 1 hour. Let sit 15 minutes before serving. Serve hot, warm or at room temperature. Serves 8 to 10.

רעדאַגירט פֿון: אַלעק סילווער

פֿון אַלעק סילווער

By ARNON REGULAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

GAZA CITY — About 40 Palestinian policemen broke into the Palestinian parliament building in Gaza City on Monday, firing in the air to protest what they said was the humiliation police are facing because of attacks by Hamas militants. No injuries were reported.

The storming came one day after fierce clashes between police and Hamas in Gaza City and the nearby Shati refugee camp, during which Hamas gunmen attacked the local police station with assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades. The camp's deputy police chief, Ali Makawi, was killed in the fighting.

Israel Radio reported that the police involved in Monday's incident are members of Makawi's unit.

The police stormed a meeting of Palestinian legislators, convened for the purpose of discussing the state of Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia's government. A bill that stated PA President Mahmoud Abbas must form a new government within two weeks was before them.

The proposal, presented by the parliament speaker, was adopted by a vote of 43-5. The legislators largely endorsed a parliamentary committee's report criticizing Qureia's cabinet for its handling of factional anarchy. However, they stopped short of a no-confidence vote.

The protesting officers did not enter the chamber in which the meeting was taking place. They were promptly removed from the parliament and continued to shoot in the air outside the building.

"Give us as least bullets to protect people and to protect our stations," one of the protesting policeman said. "Our commander died in front of us, and we were running out of bullets."

"We want the Palestinian Authority to take a stand on Hamas. Our blood is flowing for the Authority and they are not doing anything," one officer dressed in black told Reuters.

The clashes raged for about six hours, and subsided only around midnight Sunday, after Egyptian mediators stepped in. It was the fiercest internal fighting since 1996, when the Palestinian Authority clamped down on Hamas and carried out mass arrests, in response to a series of suicide bombings in Israel.

On Monday, each side was heard blaming the other for the fighting.

The Palestinian interior ministry, in charge of the security forces, said the fighting started with an argument between two men waiting in a long line at a cash machine outside a Gaza City bank. One of the men called in Hamas gunmen for support, police rushed to the scene and a gunfight erupted, the interior ministry said.

Hamas said the confrontation began when police tried to arrest Mohammed Rantisi, a Hamas activist and son of Hamas leader Abdel Aziz Rantisi, who was killed by Israel in 2004. Hamas claimed Mohammed Rantisi was unarmed.

The confrontation sparked gun battles all over the Sheikh Redwan neighbourhood between Hamas operatives and policemen, with armed Fatah operatives joining in on the side of the police.

Later, the battle spread to Shati refugee camp west of Gaza, where, according to police sources, a police officer was killed. Hamas operatives also torched the Shati police station and several cars belonging to the Palestinian police.

Abbas said that his security forces would not gloss over the clashes Sunday. "We will not remain silent in the face of this," he told reporters at his office in Gaza. "This mob behaviour, this chaos must end."

Police beefed up security around police stations and sealed off access roads on Monday, causing massive traffic jams in already congested Gaza City.

Israeli officials said they were encouraged by the Palestinian Authority's show of force, but that it was too early to judge whether this is the beginning of a crackdown on Hamas. "We can't say after this isolated incident whether the real battle has begun," said Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz.

Tension between Hamas and the Palestinian police has risen steadily over the past four days, due to the Palestinian Authority's declaration that it will no longer allow arms to be carried in the streets. Hamas promptly announced that it had no intention of abiding by this order, and its leaders even accused the PA of trying to liquidate the organization.

"There is a faction of the Palestinian Authority that is trying to eradicate the Hamas movement and plans a widespread conflict in the West Bank," Nazel said. "The hands of this faction, which is backed by Washington and London, are stained with Palestinian blood, and Hamas will confront it, even at the price of civil war."

AIPAC case judge may dismiss charges

By RON KAMPEAS and MATTHEW E. BERGER
JTA

WASHINGTON — The judge hearing a case against two former staffers of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee has raised tough questions about the government's reluctance to share information with the defendants, suggesting the reluctance could lead to a dismissal.

The contours of the trial against Steve Rosen, AIPAC's former foreign policy director, and Keith Weissman, a former Iran analyst, on charges of trading in classified information are beginning to become clear in preliminary hearings. The trial date is set for Jan. 2.

Lawrence Franklin, a former Pentagon analyst who is charged as a co-conspirator, was set to plead guilty on Wednesday, which would require him to testify against Rosen and Weissman.

In a routine scheduling session Sept. 19, Judge T.S. Ellis was taken aback by prosecutor Kevin DiGregori's plans to withhold from the defence a portion of tapes and transcripts of conversations among Rosen, Weissman and others in which the defendants allegedly incriminate themselves.

"I am having a hard time, Mr. DiGregori, getting over the fact that the defendants can't hear their own statements, and whether that is so fundamental that if it doesn't happen, this case will have to be dismissed," Ellis said.

"Have you ever heard of a case where a defendant couldn't have his own statements? I have been on the bench 18 years… and it has never happened. I don't know of any reported case."

Prosecutors said the wiretap material was "owned" by various government intelligence agencies, and it's up to those agencies to share the material.

Thomas Reilly, a Justice Department lawyer, invoked the notorious secrecy of the three-judge panel that orders wiretaps under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), and suggested that the sensitivity lay not in what Rosen and Weissman had said but in whom they were speaking with.

"It involves FISA-derived electronic surveillance, your honour, of the defendants and third parties," Reilly said.

The indictment speaks of information garnered from two U.S. government officials and relayed to three foreign officials, understood to be senior Israeli Embassy staffers.

JTA has learned that one of the U.S. government officials is David Satterfield, then deputy assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs and now the No. 2 man at the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad. The other is Kenneth Pollack, a Clinton-era National Security Council staffer and now an analyst at the Brookings Institution.

One of the Israelis is Naor Gilon, who until this summer was the chief political officer at the embassy.

None of those men has been charged. That raises questions about the government's case against Rosen and Weissman, who – according to the government scenario – would have been middlemen in the whole affair.

Rosen and Weissman also allegedly relayed some of the information in question to journalists at the Washington Post and the Nation magazine. The government may be sensitive about revealing that it wiretapped journalists and Israeli diplomats, sources close to the case say.

Judge Ellis was skeptical of the government's position, but gave the government until late last week to explain its case.

"I can understand how that conceivably might be national security information, but I find it hard to understand how the defendants shouldn't have access to it," he said, adding that he might review the material himself.

In a response filed Sept. 29, the government cited precedents to show that prosecutors need not reveal wiretapped information that is not exculpatory or is irrelevant to the defense. They likened keeping the information secret to laws that protect informants.

In the Sept. 19 hearing, Ellis said it was up to him to determine relevancy. The defendants have until Oct. 7 to respond.

Rosen's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, had raised the matter because he said a lack of access to material would prevent him from meeting court deadlines to file motions to dismiss. Ellis appeared sympathetic and postponed some of the hearings, though he was adamant that the trial would start Jan. 2.

Lowell said in court that he had spoken to lawyers for the foreign officials – apparently the Israelis – and had little hope of calling them for the defence.

"My initial inclination, from what I have spoken to counsel" for the foreign officials, "is that they are not going to make this very easy," he said.

More broadly, Lowell suggested that the government's proposed release of nine hours of recorded material was sparse, because his client was under surveillance for four years. He suggested that the government had much more material than it claimed.

"I am happy to hear, but would be surprised to find out, that there are only nine hours of surveillance tape," he said. "On the issue of motions, it will be necessary to hear everything my client said."

DiGregori suggested that the material the government wished to suppress was a small portion of the whole.

"Except for two outstanding issues on some of the FISA material," he would release everything, DiGregori said.

In the later written submission to the court, DiGregori said that even the quantity of the government's recordings should remain classified.

If Ellis allows the government to withhold some of the wiretap recordings, the defendants could consider it grounds for appeal.

AIPAC is committed to paying for the legal defence of Rosen and Weissman because of an indemnification clause in employee contracts, JTA has learned. AIPAC employees sign an agreement that protects them from legal harm until all appeals are exhausted, according to a source close to the defence of Rosen and Weissman who has first-hand knowledge of the clause.

JTA previously learned that AIPAC's bill for the pair's defence had topped $1 million, even though AIPAC fired Rosen and Weissman in April, allegedly because of information arising out of the FBI investigation. AIPAC declined to comment, as did Lowell.

Franklin, the Pentagon analyst who has been charged along with Rosen and Weissman, planned to plead guilty this week, a clerk for the court told JTA. The clerk, Edward Adams, said he did not know what charge Franklin would plead to, or if the plea is part of a larger deal.

Plato Cacheris, Franklin's lawyer, would not say what his client would plead to, but confirmed to JTA that negotiations with the government are under way and that his client would be required to testify if he pleads.

Cacheris also confirmed that part of the negotiations involved retaining Franklin's pension. Franklin has five children and an ill wife.

In the past, Cacheris had suggested that Franklin would plead guilty to charges that he moved classified documents out of a designated area to his home in West Virginia. That is the least of the charges against him, and doesn't involve Rosen or Weissman.

Rosen and Weissman were charged with "conspiracy to communicate national defence information to people not entitled to receive it," which carries a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison. Rosen also is charged with actual communication of national defence information, which also is punishable by 10 years in prison.

The charges come under the Espionage Act, but do not rise to the level of espionage.

The indictment lists charges involving incidents dating back to 1999, and is related to information on Iran and terrorist attacks in Central Asia and Saudi Arabia. For a period in 2004, Franklin worked covertly with the government and relayed allegedly classified information to Rosen and Weissman.

One charge against the pair accuses them of relaying the information in turn to Gilon, the Israeli Embassy staffer.

New year begins with hope, Israeli leaders say

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The disengagement from the Gaza Strip and part of the northern West Bank was the first step in a path that could lead to peace with the Palestinians, says Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

"There's a feeling that for the first time, carefully and responsibly, we are forging a path that could lead to significant advancements toward peace," Olmert said in an interview with Israel Radio on Monday.

"I think we're going to have to expand this path in the coming year," he said. He would not answer questions as to whether Israel would replicate its unilateral pullout, saying only that it would operate in the framework of the internationally brokered road map.

Olmert said he thinks the Palestinians are beginning to realize they have to combat terror.

"They will have to fight terror if they desire life, and they are now, perhaps, beginning to understand the significance of these matters," Olmert said. "It will take them time, but I think that if it continues along this path, then it is very likely that the year 2006 – or the year 5766, our year – will really be a year in which we take a path that could lead to a major change.

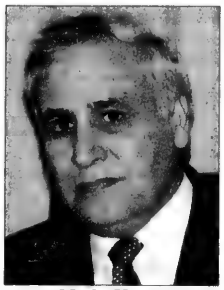
"It seems to me," he said, "that the nation of Israel is about to celebrate this holiday, this Rosh Hashanah, with a little less fear and a little more hope, a little less pain and a few more chances."

Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres, also on Monday, said the disengagement is the best event that happened this year and another step in the right direction.

David Baker, an official in the Prime Minister's Office, said Israelis hope for an "elusive peace" as the new year approaches. "Israelis ring in the new year hopeful for a year of tangible progress for reaching peace," he said.

Rosh Hashanah Greetings

We must recommit to maintain values of Judaism



Moshe Katsav
President
State of Israel

On these days, on the eve of the Jewish New Year, days of soul-searching and fasting, prayer and tzedakah, we need to recommit ourselves to maintaining the values of Judaism and to the strengthening of Jewish sovereignty.

In recent years, the State of Israel has faced difficult and fateful decisions. In the last 12 years, we have gone a long, historic way towards the Palestinians. We have made difficult and painful decisions. We have succeeded – despite pain, sorrow and crisis; despite anger, disappointment and frustration with our neighbours – we have succeeded in keeping our unity, our strength, our faith and our determination.

I commend the Jewish communities throughout the world for their expressions of solidarity with the people of Israel, which have strengthened the mutual bonds between us.

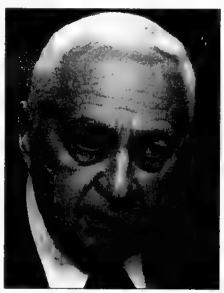
Unfortunately, anti-Semitism has increased throughout Europe, despite the position taken by European leaders. The State of Israel and the Jewish people must co-operate with the governments and relevant authorities to struggle jointly against anti-Semitism, which harms both universal human values and the values of democracy. The enlightened countries must act with determination against anti-Semitism by means of legislation, enforcement, education and public opinion.

The 21st century presents the Jewish people with challenges unique to our generation. We need to aim at deepening the ties between the Jews of Israel and those of the Diaspora and to pay attention to the needs of all the Jewish communities in the Diaspora.

We need to act to maintain Jewish culture, to ensure Jewish education for the young generation and to battle assimilation. We must ensure Jewish continuity. We must find efficient ways to draw closer and strengthen the bond and ties of the Jews of the world to the values of Judaism, to Jewish organizations and to the Jewish state.

On behalf of the people of Israel, I wish to convey to you and your families blessings for a happy New Year, a year of brotherhood and unity, a year of peace and security, a year in which we will maintain our national strength.

Looking forward with hope and optimism



Ariel Sharon
Prime Minister
State of Israel

As we stand at the dawn of a New Year, I send you my best wishes for a happy New Year from Jerusalem, the eternal and united capital of the State of Israel and the Jewish people.

The Jewish people have a long and unique history. We have overcome long periods of persecution and suffering, while at the same time achieving many magnificent and important accomplishments – the modern and vibrant State of Israel being the greatest of those.

In its short history, the State of Israel has faced many challenges. Through the good times and the bad, our brothers and sisters in the Diaspora have always stood beside us and sustained us. My government firmly believes in strengthening the ties between the Diaspora and the State of Israel, and is working to achieve that goal. We consider your support and commitment to be an invaluable asset in our efforts to safeguard Israel's vital interests.

The past few months have not been easy for the citizens of Israel. However, I believe that we will emerge from this experience united, and that Israel's identity as a Jewish and democratic state will be strengthened.

Together with you, we look forward with hope and optimism.

I wish us all a New Year of peace and quiet, health, prosperity and happiness. I hope that you will celebrate the coming year with us here in Israel, the homeland of the Jewish people.

Shanah tova and chatimah tovah.

Israeli hostage murdered

Israel's justice minister cancelled talks with a top Palestinian official to protest the killing of an Israeli man by Hamas. Tzipi Livni called off her meeting with the Palestinian Authority's minister for prisoners, Sufian Abu-Zayda, after Israeli media broadcast images of the captive Sasson Nuriel. Hamas said it abducted Nuriel, 50, to ransom him for the release of Palestinian prisoners by Israel, but then decided to kill him. The "road map" peace plan obligates the Palestinian Authority to dismantle Hamas and other terrorist groups, but PA leaders say they will not do so.

Israel's population growing

Israel's population rose by nearly 1.8 per cent in 2004 to more than 6.8 million. Some 5.2 million Israelis are Jewish, with 1.3 million Arabs and 300,000 others, according to figures released this week by the Central Bureau of Statistics. The growth rate among Muslims was 3.3 per cent, more than double the rate among Jews.

New archeological site

Israel is opening an archeological site to tourists near Jerusalem's Western Wall. The centre is underground near the wall and features a wall that dates to the First Temple and a ritual bath from the Second Temple period.

Fatah bests Hamas

Final results of municipal elections last Thursday in Palestinian towns and villages in the West Bank showed the ruling Fatah party with 54 per cent of the vote in local Palestinian elections, compared to 26 per cent for the rival Hamas group. Fatah's showing was better than expected, as the party had been losing ground to Hamas in other recent votes. Analysts said many Palestinian voters are returning to Fatah following Israel's recent pullout from the Gaza Strip. The Fatah party of Palestinian Authority Chairman Mahmoud Abbas will now control 61 municipal councils out of 104; Hamas controls 28.

Israelis warn of Iran strike

Israeli lawmakers on a visit to Washington hinted that Israel one day could resort to military force to prevent Iran from attaining nuclear weapons. Delegates from the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee who held talks with senators and members of Congress warned that if the United States does not rein in Iran's nuclear program, Israel will. "We sacrificed six million Jews because the western world did not understand what Hitler intended," said delegate Yosef (Tommy) Lapid. "We are not willing to sacrifice another six million Israelis because the world does not understand the mullahs of Iran." The committee, a parliamentary body, does not speak for the Israeli government. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has said that Israel has no plans to attack Iran.

Sharing family history during the holiday season

By SCHELLY TALALAY DARDASHTI
JTA

TEL AVIV — Reconnecting long-lost family often begins with a relative's random comment during a holiday gathering as generations gather around a dinner table. The holiday season is an ideal time to share roots and traditions, and to begin a family history project, adding lasting links to the chain of Jewish identity and continuity.

At a family gathering in Israel, Ingrid Rockberger heard a relative say that an American cousin had visited family in Sweden. Something clicked, as she vaguely recalled meeting some Swedish cousins in London, as a young child, some 50 years ago. This was the catalyst for a family reunion reuniting the Israeli, British and Swedish branches.

Decades ago, my aunt in Florida said, quite offhandedly, that her grandfather repeatedly claimed that "Talalay was our name when we left Spain." She added that no one believed it, and most laughed at the idea of our Ashkenazi, Yiddish-speaking family having such origins.

Decades went by before I began to search, but I never forgot her comment.

Mogilev, Belarus, has been the focus of my search – from there we immigrated to the United States and elsewhere. I've located far-flung branches in several countries.

However, my quest for a Sephardi connection continued, and I discovered a number of Sephardi-named families in the city, adding to the possibility.

In 2004, a Spanish researcher discovered a 1353 archival document, signed by a kosher winemaker with our rare name. This month, I'll return to Barcelona to continue the search in several archives.

While memories fade and older generations pass, writings and images survive, preserving family lore. Make sure to share these with extended family, and include copies as gifts for new babies, bar/bat mitzvahs and weddings.

In June 2005, genealogy sites received 11 million hits, and that marketing survey didn't even include JewishGen, the largest Jewish genealogical website.

According to www.ancestry.com, the world's largest genealogy website, a recent poll indicated that 73 per cent of Americans are interested in their roots. Susan King, head of www.jewishgen.org, recently announced the website, which receives millions of hits, counts some 160,000 subscribers from around the world, joined by some 5,000 new people monthly.

A proliferation of specialized books, online Jewish genealogy classes and special projects have inspired and assisted researchers in preserving family history.

Even without spending a lot of time on the web, there's a lot you can do during the holiday season to pique interest among genealogy during the High Holy Days:

• Share your family's history at holiday gatherings this year and transmit family stories to the younger generations;

• Discuss when, why and how immigrant ancestors left the old country, whether that was eastern Europe, North Africa or elsewhere. Who stayed behind and why? Did they choose to settle in certain cities because cousins were already there? Was the family name changed in the U.S.? Do you know the original name, and the town they came from?

Holiday gatherings provide opportunities to transmit the past and preserve it for future generations. Here are some suggestions:

• Record family elders as they sing traditional melodies, discuss their life experiences or relate stories told by their own grandparents;

• Encourage youngsters to interview grandparents about their lives and record those sessions;

• Discuss your family's naming patterns. Did a famous scholar ancestor account for a name appearing frequently in each generation?;

• Protect old photos by placing them in archival protectors (sold by the box at most large office supply stores), or use copies, storing the originals safely away from sticky fingers of over-enthusiastic guests;

• Keep a holiday record book. List guests' names, the menu and add each event's labelled group photo. Many families have done this for years, and it is delightful to see toddlers grow into adults with their own babies;

• All Jewish holidays revolve around food – or the lack of it – so talk about family culinary traditions that may provide hints of family origins. Peppery or sweet kugel, gefilte fish with whitefish only or other varieties provide Ashkenazi hints, while many Sephardi dishes offer community-specific variations. Preserve family favourites by sharing the recipes of holiday delights;

• When you invite your holiday guests, send them simple family sheets to complete and return;

From Rome to Jerusalem

ROME — The Vatican lent rare Jewish manuscripts to the Israel Museum. A new exhibit celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Israel Museum in Jerusalem includes an illustrated manuscript of Moses Maimonides' Mishnah Torah in the original Hebrew, on loan from the Vatican. Also on display from papal archives are Jacob ben Asher's Arba'ah Turim from 1435, as well as a complete Hebrew Bible code of laws and book of Psalms, both produced in Rome in the 13th century. They are among the earliest such manuscripts in existence. "This is the first time in history these manuscripts have been on Israeli soil, representing a new level of co-operation and cultural exchange between the Holy See and the State of Israel," said Gary Krupp, president and founder of Pave the Way Foundation, which brokered the loan.

Immigration to Israel up

JERUSALEM — Increased immigration to Israel from France and North America was cited as the cause of a rise in aliyah last year. Since September 2004, 23,124 people immigrated to Israel, as opposed to 21,604 the year before, the first increase since 1999, the Jerusalem Post reported. Zeev Bielski, the chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel, credited the increase to improved security and economics in Israel, as well as improved marketing by the agency. - JTA

94-year-old makes aliyah to be near family

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

At 94 years old, Holocaust survivor Elizabeth Neuman could rightfully sit back and relax.

Just prior to Rosh Hashanah, however, Neuman and her daughter Jeanniane Sternberg sold the home they shared in Hamilton and were in the process of packing up their belongings and preparing to move to Israel.

It wasn't a hard decision, Neuman says. "My daughter wanted to live near her two daughters and grandchildren who live in Israel, and I go where she goes."

Family is "everything" to her, she says. "I lost three sisters and three brothers in the war, so it's important to remain with the family we have."

Immigrating is not new to her, says Neuman. She moved from her native Hungary to France in the 1930s, and later moved to Canada. "It's my third big move. I'm used to picking up and going."

Sternberg, a former French and Hungarian freelance court interpreter, says that for her mother, moving to Israel is the culmination of a lifetime "full of bravery."

During the war, while in Paris, Neuman's husband was taken prisoner (he survived the war), and she rented an apartment 30 kilometres from Paris under a different name and gave shelter to a cousin.

Elizabeth Neuman

"[My mother] feared for my life, so she took me to a Catholic private school and hid me there. It was a very difficult time. She worried about me, she worried about my father, and she had to take care of herself. Other than the cousin, she was all alone," Sternberg says.

"I look at my own two daughters, and I am thankful that they did not have to live like that."

Neuman, who was widowed 42 years ago, worked in Canada for 50 years as a dress designer, says Sternberg, whose own husband died in 2003.

"She lost her family in the war, and then her husband died at a young age. She did what she had to do to take care of us," Sternberg says.

"She has lived with my family since 1965 and she always helped out – babysitting, cooking, baking. She was always active, and never complained."

Neuman and Sternberg have visited their family in Israel a number of times, "but it's time to spend our futures in the same country. It's the logical thing to do," Neuman says.

Sternberg says that she and her husband had talked about moving to Israel, "but now the time is right. All our papers are in order and we're ready to go. I do plan on retaining my Canadian citizenship, however. I'll be back from time to time."

Neuman is not too concerned about the big move because, she says, "God has always looked after me. I know I'll be happy there because my family makes me happy. They keep me young at heart.

"I don't know about the Hebrew, but at my age I may still learn or word or two."

Maj group plans fundraiser for breast cancer

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Eight local women have turned their weekly mah-jong game into a fight against breast cancer.

Together with six other mah-jong players, they've formed Maj for Mammaries, a fundraising initiative for breast cancer awareness and research.

Their first event, to be held Oct. 23 at Beth Sholom Synagogue, is Shanghai Sisters, an afternoon of mah-jong, social bridge and board games.

Pam Hamovitch, a member of the Maj for Mammaries steering committee, said the seeds for the fundraiser were planted when she brought up the idea of raising money as a group for a local charity.

"We decided to do something related to [mah-jong], and we chose breast cancer as the charity, because it's an issue that has affected our group. Two of us had breast cancer before we turned 40."

The women are earmarking their money toward a study of breast cancer in women under 40, said group member Rickey Fitzerman, "because [these women] have issues that [are seldom] addressed on an independent level."

They interviewed a number of foundations, she said, and selected Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre because of its efforts to help women who develop breast cancer before age 45.

Hamovitch said that between five and 10 per cent of all new breast cancer diagnoses occur in this demographic.

"Younger women have different psychological and social issues, and often need unusual medical treatment. We want to help [the hospital] give these women hope, dignity and a belief that they, too, can play mah-jong for many years to come," she said.

The hospital has been receptive to their initiative, she added. "We wanted to partner in a hands-on way, not just have our money donated into a general pool."

Tickets for Maj for Mammaries are $75 and include lunch, silent auction and a raffle. Call 416-932-9406 for information.

The King

Shayna intently studied the piece of yellow construction paper. She outlined the shape of a crown, first with a pencil, then with a marker. Carefully, she used scissors to cut it out. She drew rubies and emeralds, and put on stickers that looked like diamonds. Now she just needed to staple it together. "Mindy!" she called to her sister in the kitchen. "Could you staple my crown for me?"

"It's almost Rosh Hashanah, and you're making another crown? Imma told you to set the table!"

"I will set the table. Just please do this first."

"All right, just wait a minute. I have to finish cutting the carrots and then wash my hands."

Shayna waited impatiently until Mindy came out of the kitchen, quickly stapled the crown, and returned to the cooking.

"Noam!" called Shayna. "Where are you? Your crown is ready! Now you can be king!"

Noam scampered down the staircase, yelling, "King! King! King!"

Ceremoniously, Shayna reached over to the chair next to her and picked up the waiting quilt. Noam straightened as she wrapped it around him, and opened his hand to accept his "sceptre," a yardstick. Slowly, she placed the crown on his head, solemnly declaring, "You are now King Noam."

"Ha ha!" laughed Noam. "I'm king! I can do whatever I want!" He marched into the kitchen. "Mindy! Look at me! Look at me!"

Mindy looked up from the pomegranates she was slicing. "Very nice, Noam."

"King Noam." said Shayna.

"King Noam," Mindy corrected herself. "Shayna, why are you dressing up Noam right now? There's still so much to do for Rosh Hashanah. You're supposed to set that table, and I need someone to take all the seeds out of the pomegranates."

"OK, I'll do that now. Where should I put the seeds?"

"In this bowl. Careful, the juice can stain."

"Thanks." Shayna dug her nails between the tough outer rind and the pockets of bulging seeds, and the sweet juice burst out, turning the tips of her fingers red. She pulled apart the seeds, throwing out the thin membrane between them.

Mindy turned to her younger brother. "And Noam, could you please..."

"I don't have to do anything!" declared Noam. "I'm king! I do what I want to do!"

"I think someone is about to lose his crown."

Horrified, Noam ran upstairs.

"Look what you've done!" complained Mindy, as the oven timer went off. "Why did you have to play king today?"

"Because Rosh Hashanah is the holiday of kings! I learned about it in school. That's why we eat pomegranates on Rosh Hashana. Because they have crowns. See?" She picked up the crowned pomegranate to demonstrate.

"You're right that Rosh Hashanah has to do with kings, but not the way you think," answered Mindy, checking on the challahs.

"What do you mean?"

"Well, what do you think being a king is all about?"

"Ask Noam."

"I thought he's upstairs."

Shayna giggled. "He's hiding behind the door."

"Shhh!" said King Noam.

"Don't worry, Noam, you're not in trouble," explained Mindy, grabbing a potholder. "We just wanted to ask you what it means to be king."

"It means I can do whatever I want. I don't have to listen to anybody. I can eat all the candy I want."

"Do you agree, Shayna?"

"I guess."

"So you're saying that a king rules for his own good. He doesn't care about his subjects. To him, they are just there to serve him. Would you want a king like that to rule over you?"

"I guess not...so why did people use to have kings?"

"Most of the time because the king conquered the country and took over, whether they wanted him to or not."

"I see," replied Shayna sadly. "Maybe Noam shouldn't be king."

"Maybe not. But you know, every once in awhile there's a good king. He cares about his subjects. Everything he does is for their good, not his. I'm learning in high school about King David. Even though he had complete power over the Jewish nation, he did everything for their good. There was a plague, and everyone was dying. King David asked God to kill him instead of the people. That's how much he cared about them."

"I'm done with the seeds."

"Let me see...wow! That's a lot. Good work, Shayna."

"Yeah. Now I have to set that table. Could I use the sink quickly?"

Mindy moved out of the way, holding a ceramic honey pot.

"But Mindy...so what is Rosh Hashanah about?"

"Oh, so now you can understand. Rosh Hashana is about a very special king. A good King."

"Who, King David?"

"No. God."

"God? God is a king?"

"Of course. He's king of everything. And Rosh Hashanah is the day he created the whole world and became king over it."

"So what's that have to do with us?"

"Every year, on Rosh Hashanah, we accept God as our King."

"I didn't know that. When do we do that?"

"At the synagogue."

"Oh. Maybe I should go tomorrow."

"Maybe."

"I'm king!" declared Noam, strolling through the dining room.

"Really?" answered Shayna. "Do you know how to be a real king?"

"Oh no," laughed Mindy. "You're going to try to explain that to Noam?"

"Sure, why not? It's worth a try."

Acclaimed Moscow Chamber Orchestra performs in Toronto

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Individually, each is a musical dynamo. They are Costantine Orbelian, the gifted conductor, Galina Gorchakova, a revered soprano, and the Moscow Chamber Orchestra, perennially performing before sold-out audiences across the globe.

Together, then, it should follow that they'll put on a magnificent show.

"I must say that all of our many performances with Galina Gorchakova have been met with both great audience approval, as well as critical acclaim," Orbelian says.

"Galina's voice meshes with anything. It's gorgeous."

The unique collaboration between these celebrated musicians will be showcased on Oct. 6 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts' George Weston Hall.

The program will include Tchaikovsky's Serenade, Grieg's Holberg Suite and Prokofiev's Fugitive Vision.

The Toronto performance will be followed with a seven-concert tour of the United States.

Lauded for parlaying the orchestra into an international success, Orbelian is an American émigré to Russia, born and raised in San Francisco to parents of Russian and Armenian ancestry.

He is the first American ever to take the reins of a Russian ensemble and has nothing but kudos for Russia's legacy of musical genius.

"Just look at the output of 20th-century music and where does one look most often – the former USSR," Orbelian says.

His grandfather, Agaparon Orbelian, was arrested and executed in a Moscow prison in the 1930s.

His father was imprisoned for four years by the Germans during World War II, while his mother was forced to work in prisoner-of-war camps throughout the war.

Yet Orbelian points out that Armenians and Jews have often excelled in the arts, not in spite of their strife but because of it.

"Jews and Armenians in general have always excelled in difficult conditions ... and I do believe that there must be some kind of correlation between problems and music," he says.

"One is swept away with the haunting and mesmerizing power of the ethnic 'voice' in that music."

Trained as a pianist, Orbelian toured for a number of years on the concert circuit, which included stints with the Moscow Chamber Orchestra.

In 1990, following the death of the orchestra's music director, he was an obvious choice to take the helm and has shone in that role ever since.

Today, in an average year, Orbelian and the orchestra perform upward of 120 concerts. Though the schedule is demanding, the maestro relishes every second of it.

"Once you do it for a while and love it, there isn't anything that will pull [you] off the stage willingly," he says.

With Orbelian conducting, the orchestra has made about two dozen recordings, including their latest with famed Russian baritone Dmitri Hvorostovsky.

Israeli documentary highlights environmental problems

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Preserving our precious environment from human-induced degradation is no small task. Whether we are fighting to save forests in Canada, jungles in Brazil, rivers in Mexico or lakes in Russia, the struggle against mindless polluters never really ceases.

At last week's sixth annual Planet in Focus Festival, Toronto's film and video festival, this important issue was highlighted yet again.

Planet Earth Once, a 25-minute documentary by Miri Urman and Amit Miller, which had its Canadian premiere here, focused on problems in Israel.

This engaging film, in Hebrew with English subtitles, follows a group of young Israeli environmentalists, known as Megama Yeruka, around Israel as they try to raise environmental awareness in a country obsessed by security concerns and the threat of random terrorism.

Sometimes dressed as clowns on stilts, or merrily bouncing a ball with a map of the world, they campaign to win hearts and minds with humour and passion.

Their chief concern appears to be the Trans Israel Highway, a north-south road being laid out by a Canadian company.

There is no cogent explanation why this super highway is bad for the environment. But the filmmakers leave the impression that far too many trees are being sacrificed for the sake of this road.

Planet Earth Once, in fact, begins as a young protester tries in vain to stop a bulldozer from doing its work. Pushing and shoving ensue, and the cry of "leave me alone" is heard.

Midway through the film, which unfolds in part to the rhythms of Hebrew hip-hop music, demonstrators chide an Israeli bank for its role in financing the construction of the highway.

In the port of Eilat, the activists warn of the perils of water and air pollution, and in Ashkelon, they rail against a coal-fired power plant.

Megama Yeruka activists in Israel call for environmental awareness.

Stopping at the Israeli Arab town of Um al Fahm, they call for the recycling of garbage, and succeed in persuading schoolchildren to shout in unison, "We will protect the environment."

Pulling up in the town of Netivot in their brightly coloured van, they urge children to preserve energy. And in Jerusalem, they lambaste a municipal decision to raze a forest so that an underground parking lot can be erected.

Ending their tour in Tel Aviv, they demonstrate against air pollution and speak of the spectre of global warming.

They seem to be fighting an uphill battle on behalf of mother earth, but their cause is just, as Planet Earth Once suggests.

18-year-old has a nose for acting

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When Jeremy Ferdman showed up at an open call audition for a commercial, he wasn't quite sure how to respond when asked if he had a special talent.

"I had no idea what the [commercial] was for," recalls Ferdman. "So I said I can sing, I can mime and I can belly dance."

Bingo!

Ferdman was beckoned to showcase his rhythm and indeed, his moves didn't go belly up.

"A week later, they called me back and said they took the shot from the audition and put it into the commercial," he enthuses.

While auditions aren't always that easy or spontaneous for the aspiring Toronto actor, his star has been on the rise since a foray into the world of show business four years ago.

The 18-year-old counts roles in the hit television show Queer as Folk, famed play Grease and the lead in a Holocaust production called Birthright, among his acting credits.

In November, viewers will get an "in your face" perspective of Ferdman on the Life Network makeover show, Skin Deep.

The show details Ferdman's experience getting a nose job. "They followed me around... getting different perspectives from my family and my girlfriend about me getting a nose job," he says. "And they showed the procedure on the show."

The recent graduate of Newtonbrook Secondary School says both he and his family relished having the camera lights rolling on their respective real worlds.

"For me, I love being around the camera all the time and my family liked it too," Ferdman relates.

Ferdman's family is very supportive of his acting endeavours and is proud that he's taken a particular liking to Jewish theatre.

His grandfather, a Holocaust survivor, was beaming the night Ferdman took the stage in Birthright, a play focusing on the tribulations of a Jewish family in Nazi Germany.

"I did this play for my grandfather because I knew he'd love it and it would make him feel good," Ferdman says.

In fact, the actor's first exposure to performance arts was at Jewish summer camp where he discovered his affinity for the stage.

He then plied his trade in high school productions and finally, got an agent.

"It's never been about the money or fame," Ferdman offers. "It's about satisfaction and seeing the [final product] after the dedication you put it in to it."

The performer hopes audiences have some satisfaction of their own with his next big gig, the starring role in the film Stock Boy, a somewhat quirky picture about a grocery store employee who has just one day to prove himself to be the employee of the month.

Jeremy Ferdman

Right now, Ferdman is devoting this year to acting, but intends on studying theatre at Ryerson University.

After that, he has his much loftier dreams. "My plan is to win an Academy Award by the time I'm 28," he says.

If he keeps it up, the Oscars may be calling even sooner than that.

EDEET RAVEL NOMINATED FOR GILLER PRIZE FOR WALL OF LIGHT

Novelist Edeet Ravel, formerly of Montreal and lately of Guelph, Ont., was named a finalist last week for the prestigious Scotiabank Giller Prize. Ravel's latest novel, A Wall of Light, was published recently by Random House Canada as the third and final instalment of her so-called Tel Aviv trilogy.

Her acclaimed first novel, Ten Thousand Lovers (2003), was a finalist for the Governor General's award. Her second novel, Look for Me, was published in 2004.

Some 94 books were submitted for consideration by the Giller jury this year, and four other authors were shortlisted along with Ravel. They are Joan Barfoot for her novel Luck, David Bergen for The Time In Between, Camilla Gibb for Sweetness in the Belly and Lisa Moore for Alligator.

The winner of the $40,000 prize is to be announced at a black-tie gala evening on Nov. 8. Each runner-up receives a consolation prize of $2,500.

Christie Pits Documentary: Toronto's largest "race riot" erupted in the Christie Pits park in 1933 when a softball game turned into a fight after some young Nazi sympathizers unfurled a swastika flag. The episode is the subject of a documentary film, The Riot at Christie Pits, the first in a series of Jewish-content films to be shown at the Bloor Cinema. Prof. William Shaffir, co-author of the book of the same name, and Joe Black, one of those interviewed in the film, are among the expected guests at the screening. The film is being presented by Shlomo Schwartzberg, film critic and former programmer of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, and Bill Stern, author of You Don't Have to Be Jewish. Bloor Cinema, Sunday, Oct. 9, 2 p.m.

Names in the News: Tel Aviv resident Gili Bar-Hillel, official Hebrew translator of the Harry Potter books by J. K. Rowlings, spoke at a recent Harry Potter conference in Reading, England. The Harvard-educated Israeli linguist said she has become so well-known in Israel that "people come up to me in the street and ask me why I'm out and about and not working on the latest book," she told the London Jewish Chronicle.

People also freely complain to her about what they may consider a poor choice of word, Bar-Hillel said. For example, some have told her the Israeli word "sharvit" is too phonetically harsh to be an adequate translation for the English word "wand."

Bar-Hillel was not the only speaker to touch on Jewish themes at the conference. Cia Sautter, an American professor, outlined kabbalistic elements in Rowlings' writings, and Amy Miller, a New York reform cantor, delineated the "Yiddishe" qualities in the character of Harry Potter. "He may not wear a yarmulka or eat gefilte fish, but he is, in essence, a nice Jewish boy," Miller said.

Suriname synagogue finds a new home

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

JERUSALEM — The Israel Museum in Jerusalem, already the home of three reconstructed synagogues from around the world, will be further enriched by the addition of the Zedek-ve-Shalom Synagogue from Suriname.

When complete, probably by the summer of 2007, this Spanish/Portuguese synagogue will join ones from Horb, Germany; Vittorio Veneto, Italy; and Cochin, India, in its new home in the Judaica and Jewish ethnography wing.

"The restoration will include all the wooden artifacts, such as the benches, the bimah, the Aron Kodesh, the beautiful brass lamps and all the small artifacts that were part of the synagogue," says project curator Tania Coen.

The exterior (originally 23 by 13 metres) will be reconstructed at smaller dimensions and will try to replicate the original as closely as possible. "This will include some virtual reality expedient in order to create a very special experience for the visitor," Coen says.

"While the building is a reconstruction, the objects are the real thing. In order to convey to the visitor the true spatial dimensions, we are proposing to project images of the interior walls."

The original interior of the Zedek-ve-Shalom Synagogue in Suriname with its sandy floors and high vaulted ceiling.

The Zedek-ve-Shalom Synagogue, completed in 1736, is a rectangular wooden building with high vaulted ceilings. Brass candelabras hang from the ceiling, and there is one extraordinary free-standing brass candelabra. The floor is covered with white sand, which like the interior objects, will be imported to Israel.

The project started about eight years ago. Suriname's once-vibrant community today numbers around 200 and the synagogue was in poor condition from disuse.

"The Jewish community of Suriname was unable to afford the expenses to restore it," Coen says. "In order to save the precious artifacts, some of the members of the Jewish community turned to the Israel Museum, which acted quickly to persuade the board to donate the synagogue's interior to the museum."

In March 2001, the museum opened a small display presenting the story of the synagogue's rescue, a model of the exterior and a display of original fittings from the synagogue.

This installation will be the largest of the four. Due to space limitations, the Judaica and Jewish ethnography will have to undergo some renovation. The gallery roof will have to be removed to accommodate the height of the synagogue and one of the current synagogues will be moved. The Suriname synagogue will be placed next to the Cochin one, and a pathway will connect all four, giving visitors a full cultural experience.

"If our proposed plan will receive the OK, we will change some of the permanent exhibition in order to fit this project," Coen says. During the time it takes to construct the synagogue, a small part of the ethnography will be closed for up to two months.

The project is expected to cost $1.6 million (US).

The synagogue consists of a main nave and two lateral aisles divided by rows of pillars. The western part contains the women's gallery. An elegant Torah Ark of cedar and mahogany wood stands against the eastern wall, the raised bimah is in the back, and the benches are arranged along the side walls. Especially prominent are the imposing benches where the rabbi and the parnassim (benefactors) sat. The ceremonial objects – Torah finials (rimmonim), crowns and pointers are of excellent quality, most likely made in the Netherlands.

The first group of Jewish settlers arrived in Suriname from Brazil as early as 1639. They settled on the upper Suriname River, where they founded sugar-cane plantations they named after Biblical sites such as Hebron, Goshen and Carmel.

During the late 17th century, several Ashkenazi Jewish families arrived, and by the mid-18th century the community continued to grow and prosper. Two synagogues were built in Paramaribo, the capital of Suriname, the Ashkenazi "Neve Shalom" synagogue in 1723 (still in use) and the Sepharadi Zedek-ve-Shalom.

By the beginning of the 20th century, most of the wealthy Jews began sending their children to Holland to study. Others emigrated, and the Jewish community slowly faded.

Joseph Serge flew to Israel via Frankfurt as a guest of Lufthansa Airlines and the Israel Museum, Jerusalem. In Jerusalem, he stayed at the Mishkenot Sha'ananim Guest House. (02-6292220).

Art imitates life for two brothers in Hart of the Annex

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It's a dream come true for two Jewish brothers who grew up in the upscale Toronto neighbourhood of Forest Hill and loved to pass the time fooling around with a video camera.

Hart Massey, 29 and his brother Yale, 26, recently celebrated the launch of Hart of the Annex, a show about a struggling actor, played by Hart, who is eking out a living by working at a vintage clothing shop in the Annex in downtown Toronto.

This is a clear example of art imitating life, as both Hart and Yale have struggled in show business, and work out of a studio in a clothing shop called Dressmaking and Tailoring in, well, the heart of the Annex.

But Yale said the character Hart Massey is a huge exaggeration of what the real Hart is like.

"[The show] is a farce. Everything is always blowing up in Hart's face and nothing ever seems to go quite as planned," said Yale, who is a film studies graduate and the director of what he calls a reality sitcom.

Hart said despite the fact that he likes to think the character is a much bigger loser than he is, the Massey brothers decided to stick with Hart's real name because of the history behind it.

"It is a really famous Canadian name. The Massey family was a really big agricultural family in the 1800s and they became major philanthropists," said Hart, who is a University of Toronto graduate and has been acting in theatre and television since he was 10 years old.

"We found something amusing about that, so that is why we kept the name and the persona. It worked for [comedian Jerry] Seinfeld, so why not?"

He said that although he and Yale loved and grew up on shows such as Seinfeld, The Cosby Show and Three's Company, situational comedies have evolved.

"They don't make them like they used to," Yale said.

"With shows like The Office, Trailer Park Boys, Curb Your Enthusiasm and all these great shows now, they don't have the laugh track. So the audience can actually choose when to laugh."

They added that shows like Friends and Everybody Loves Raymond, are disappearing and networks are having a hard time replacing them.

"They are not nearly as interesting or humorous as the ones that are on location or outside the studio. That is really what made our show possible to make," said Hart.

"There was some groundwork already laid where audiences are in tune with the idea that we don't have to listen to canned laughter in the background and we can watch this real person and his daily follies."

The concept for Hart of the Annex was born from an impulse to crash a friend's live improv comedy show with a video camera and film the chaos that ensued.

"We went to the theatre with a camera and literally busted through the doors claiming we knew a guy in the show," Hart said.

Yale's concept for the improvisation they filmed was that Hart's acting career was so dead, he was desperately trying to get Adam Lazarus – who plays a talent agent in Hart of the Annex – and his improv crew together for a reunion tour.

"From this ridiculous improv, we cut together a 20-minute show," Hart said.

Pleased with the final product, they filmed another episode and decided this kind of scripted reality would be a great idea for a TV show.

"Yale and I said, 'Let's see if we can go and generate some interest from a broadcaster.'"

Rogers Television program developer Bryan Peters liked the similarities between Hart of the Annex and the new, cutting-edge serial comedies such as Corner Gas and The Office.

The fact that the show is local also appealed to Peters, who agreed to include the show in Rogers programming.

"We were seeing Trailer Park Boys, which is based in the East Coast, or Corner Gas, which is based in Saskatchewan, but no one was making the Toronto sitcom," Hart explained.

They said they felt this series would fill that void and would show Canadians all over the country that "Toronto doesn't take itself so seriously."

"That's why someone in Vancouver is going to want to watch this… If you can laugh at Toronto and make fun of it, and bring it down to a level where other people can understand, they're going to appreciate that," Hart said.

"No one wants to laugh about a successful guy. That's why we made the show about a loser – because Mr. Successful isn't funny."

Despite the fact that Rogers agreed to air the six episodes of Hart of the Annex as well as any more episodes they might make, Peters warned them that Rogers doesn't have the resources to fund the production.

"We have tons of ideas for new episodes, so we're currently looking for the financing to try to make more. Hopefully there is a broadcaster that is going to pick this up and really get behind it," Hart said.

The brothers are encouraged by their recent success and show no signs of slowing down.

"The goal is that we want to go national. We want to cross Canada. It's a bit of a dream come true. Being able just to make it, being able to watch it on television now is amazing," Hart said.

Hart of the Annex, which first aired on the Rogers channel in the Greater Toronto Area on Sept. 22, can be seen on Thursdays at 8 p.m., Saturdays at 7:30 p.m. and Sundays at 10:30 p.m.

Winnipeg author tackles social issues of early 1900s

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Allan Levine, the hybrid Winnipeg novelist, historian and school teacher, says he is putting his Jewish detective hero Sam Klein on the shelf for a while, even though his trio of Sam Klein mystery novels "has done well in Canada and in Germany, where I did a five-city book tour last fall."

The Sam Klein books – The Blood Libel (1997), Sins of the Suffragette (2000) and The Bolshevik's Revenge (2002) – were set in Winnipeg's rough-and-tumble North End of nearly a century ago. Contacted by telephone recently at his home in Winnipeg, Levine said he was reaching back to a slightly earlier historical period for his next project, a new mystery book with a whole new set of characters.

"Sam Klein may live again, but not at the moment," he said, adding that he has chosen to set his new mystery series in the 1870s.

Klein has charted an interesting career path since earning a PhD in history from the University of Toronto in the '80s. A teacher at St. John's Ravenscourt, an independent high school in Winnipeg for the past 21 years, he has established a writing rhythm in recent years, seeming to knock off fiction and nonfiction titles intermittently. He is the prolific author of three mystery novels and five nonfiction works.

Like the mystery novels, some of his nonfiction works deal with Jewish themes. Fugitives of the Forest (1998) is a study of Jewish partisan resistance during World War II, and Scattered Among the People (2002) is an examination of the Jewish Diaspora in 10 portraits.

His latest book, The Devil in Babylon, appeared earlier this year under the imprimatur of McClelland and Stewart, and is a wide-ranging examination of what Levine calls "fear of progress and the birth of modern life."

Focused on the period between about 1890 and 1930, it looks at the key social issues of the period: immigration, liquor, eugenics, women's rights, and the conflict between science and religion. In each sphere of debate, Levine highlights the moral tug-of-war taking place between social liberals and conservatives.

'It's hard to believe how popular eugenics was'

The period also saw the rise of the automobile, radio, Hollywood, jazz and other beacons of technological progress. Many feared that movies would cause the demise of society while others condemned each new dance craze. Suffragists for women's rights, who were sometimes male as well as female, were also feared as harbingers of social decay.

To social conservatives, these modern social innovations would transform society into an evil and immoral "modern Babylon," whereas social reformers thought the changes would usher in an idealistic "new Jerusalem," Levine observes.

The Devil in Babylon profiles many of the personalities that marked the era, including anarchist Emma Goldman, actress Mae West, prohibitionist-creationist William Jennings Bryan, reformer J.S. Woodsworth, gangster Al Capone, suffragist Nellie McClung and pacifist Jane Addams.

Levine devotes a chapter to the so-called science of eugenics, which, although widely dismissed today, influenced many Americans and Canadians in the early 20th century. "Eugenics, the notion of creating a better human being, was perceived as another form of progress," he said.

"It's hard to believe how popular it was. We look back on it as a frightening concept, but many ordinary middle-class Americans thought that the idea of sterilizing certain groups of people would benefit society and that it would be a step forward. It was really the Nazis who took it to the extreme in the World War II."

The Devil in Babylon is a thoughtful social history with an impressive scope.

CJN Profile

Emmy winner took a chance on television writing

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Fourteen years ago, David Shore chucked his career as a partner in a Toronto law firm and headed for Los Angeles to try his hand at television scriptwriting.

"It's one of those great stupid stories," he said in a phone interview last week from the L.A. office where he works on House, the Fox television medical drama now in its second year. Shore, the series' creator, won an Emmy award Sept. 18 for dramatic writing for the show.

Until 1991, Shore's only related experience was a stint as editor of the University of Toronto's law school paper before he graduated in 1992, and "a little stand-up comedy" at Yuk Yuk's. "I had no reason to think I could [write for television]."

But with no family responsibilities and his 30th birthday already behind him, Shore decided to "go for it" and devote himself full time to pursuing a dream that had been at the back of his mind.

Reactions from family and friends were mixed, ranging from "You're out of your mind" – albeit less of that than he expected – to "I wish I'd had the guts to do that when I was your age."

Within a few years, he had a job writing for Due South, a show that was set in Chicago but filmed in Toronto. He returned to Canada briefly in the mid-'90s for that show and also for Traders, a show he developed for Global television, where he served as head writer and supervising producer.

He has written episodes of NYPD Blue, and was part of the writing team of the Emmy-winning first season of The Practice. As a producer of Law & Order, he received two Emmy nominations.

Although Shore, who practised corporate and municipal law, said he didn't love law, he added that he didn't hate it either. He figured it could be a fallback if things didn't work out.

And while television allows him to be creative, he maintains that all jobs have a creative aspect. "I think the entertainment industry pooh-poohs everything else as being a lot drier than it really is. I think I had to be pretty creative as an attorney, and I don't mean that in a negative way. I had to think creatively, but it's just more obvious when you're writing shows for TV."

Television is a "pretty hard" field to break into, he said. "There are a lot of people who want to do this." Also, he added, the path to becoming a television writer is not nearly as well-defined as the path to becoming a lawyer.

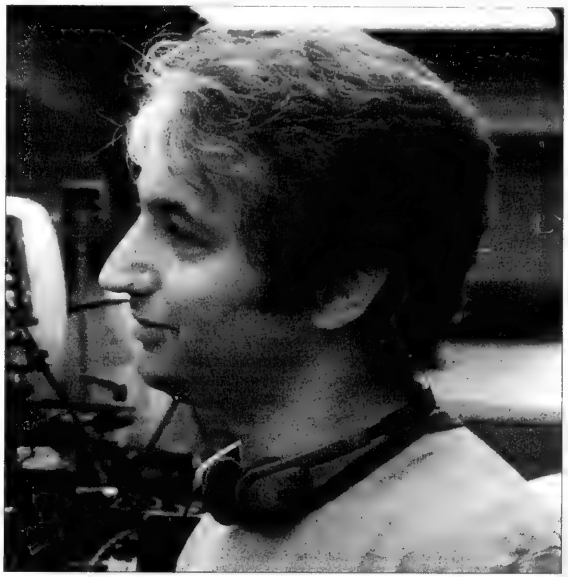
In fact, he wouldn't recommend television writing as a career. "If you succeed, it couldn't be any better. It's an opportunity to entertain people and touch their lives. But it's a tough business. Even if you have talent, you may not succeed."

For prospective writers who want to take their chances, he recommends that they "just write. The more you write, the better you get.

"And don't be Canadian about it," he adds. "Canadians are so shy. They'll send something in and not follow up.



David Shore

Feel free to annoy people. It's such a competitive business. I think you have to get into people's faces."

But the native of London, Ont., who attended the University of Western Ontario there as an undergraduate student, admits that he didn't really follow that route. "I don't think I did," he said.

A combination of luck and talent has resulted in fairly consistent employment over the past 14 years. "The reality is that even if you're successful, there's a good chance you'll be looking for work in six months."

His longest gig was three years writing for Family Law. "You have to adjust," he said.

Has he been tempted to return to steady employment as a lawyer? "It hasn't happened yet."

Now the father of three children, age 9, 7 and 3, Shore met his wife Judy, a former television producer, in Los Angeles. She was a good friend of his cousin's – the two women had met while studying at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Shore, 46, is the oldest of three brothers who grew up in what he called "a typical Reform-type Jewish household." He had his bar mitzvah at London's Conservative synagogue, Congregation Or Shalom. He now belongs to a Conservative synagogue in L.A., and his brothers, twins two years his junior, are Aish HaTorah rabbis in Jerusalem.

In his Emmy acceptance speech, Shore credited his mother, Cecile, a one-time nurse who is involved in Hadassah-WIZO, and his father, Marvin, a retired accountant and trustee in bankruptcy who was a member of provincial parliament for London North in the mid-1970s, "for making me happy and well-enough adjusted to enjoy this."

Shore told The CJN he was shocked and stunned to learn that he had won the Emmy. "It was thrilling – [although] it shouldn't be. I'm writing. I'm telling stories. It's a subjective art form."

The winning episode revealed the medical history of title character Dr. Gregory House, a top diagnostician with an abrasive manner, a limp, a cane and an addiction to painkillers.

Shore remembers thinking the episode, titled Three Stories, was either the worst thing he'd written, or the best. "I honestly wasn't sure."

Ironically, Shore said he's never been a huge fan of medical shows, although "in a weird way that might be good for me. It has forced me to go the character route."

To ensure medical accuracy, in its first season the show used a physician consultant, who has since joined the writing team. "We read stuff like the New York Times magazine and the New England Journal of Medicine," said Shore, citing some of the starting points for story ideas. "And people at parties tell us stories," he added.

He sees the show as a "dramatic exercise… I think what makes it interesting is the human stories."

Religion plays a minimal role in House, although one of the characters (Dr. Wilson) is Jewish, Shore said. "Generally television goes to great lengths to ignore religion, and I think that's really artificial. Even if someone's not religious, religion is a significant part of their life, especially at times of crisis."

Possible historic departure for divorce law in Israel

Syrtash, who delivered a key speech to the conference, cited figures showing that since legislation was introduced in Canada, there has been an 85 per cent drop in manipulation of the get by recalcitrant spouse to extort concessions and other incidents of get abuse.

> 'Ontario only the second jurisdiction in the world to change secular law to accommodate Jewish concerns'

In 1985, Ontario revised its Family Law Act to deny a spouse access to property upon marriage breakdown unless he or she first removes all barriers to religious remarriage. It became only the second jurisdiction in the world, after New York state, to change secular law to accommodate Jewish concerns.

In late 1989, after much lobbying from all quarters of the Jewish community, the federal government amended its Divorce Act to make a recalcitrant spouse unable to proceed with a civil divorce, claims for spousal and child support, child custody or even access to children.

Syrtash helped craft both pieces of legislation, and he now believes they will be implemented in Israel.

He's confident that whether it is passed by the Knesset or used in beit dins (rabbinical courts), "one way or another, I suspect the Canadian model will be adopted" in Israel.

That could also mean a historic departure for Israel: giving civil courts a role to play in divorce.

> Canada has provided rabbis in Israel 'with a real tool to do it the right way'

"The rabbis [at the meeting] said they believed the rabbinical courts will suggest the Canadian model be adopted, but they hesitated at first because they not want to extend power to civil courts. They felt that would give civil courts some kind of power over divorce, which they never had before," Syrtash told The CJN.

"But they appeared to relent because this [agreement] would give [religious courts] the power to say, 'You will have to obtain a get before we allow you to have any relief in the secular court.'"

Syrtash was invited to the conference by Peretz Segal, a senior legal adviser to Israel's justice ministry, which now encompasses parts of the former ministry of religious affairs. The gathering included representatives from the prime minister's office, secular courts and the appellate division of Israel's Supreme Rabbinical Court. It was co-sponsored by Bar-Ilan University's Emanuel Rackman Law Center and the Israeli Bar Association.

In his speech, Syrtash said it's "incumbent upon lawmakers and rabbis to look at every conceivable alternative that is halachically permissible to prevent such abominations [as agunot] from happening or from continuing to happen, and to do so immediately."

The Jerusalem Post reported that the idea to adopt the Canadian model was received "enthusiastically" by Rabbi Shlomo Dichovsky of the Supreme Rabbinical Court.

Reports added, however, that some halachic issues need to be worked out before the method can be used, including determining whether it constitutes coercion.

A get given under coercion is considered null and void. If a woman relies on such a get to remarry and gives birth, her children are considered illegitimate (mamzerim) and are forbidden from marrying a Jew.

Syrtash quoted Rabbi Mordechai Ochs of Toronto's beit din as saying that the Canadian method of delaying a civil divorce until the get is issued is not coercive. "It merely acknowledges that the Canadian government will not sanction a Jewish marriage without a get."

What makes the Canadian law "halachically appropriate," Syrtash explained, "is that it's merely procedural" and not punitive.

Canada, he went on, has provided rabbis in Israel "with a real tool to go back to Halachah, to do something based on Jewish law and to do it the right way rather than the cynical way, where women have to lower their child support or have to give up something, [or] where they have to come with bags of money to pay off these men."

Israel's rabbinical courts process about 9,000 divorces a year, he told the conference. Since 2003, about 360 people waited more than a year for the get – half of them men.

Israeli hockey squad skates in Spartak Cup

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

The Israeli ice hockey team playing in a Russian Super League tournament with a group of French Canadian skaters? You've got to be kidding!

Well, there they were, the boys in blue, squaring off against the Ukrainian national team, Spartak and Khimik of the Russian Super League, Neman of Belarus and the Vienna Capitals from Austria at the famous Spartak Cup, where many of the world's best Russian players have honed their skills.

"It's phenomenal and it shows our players we're committed to the program and are committed to getting better," said Ice Hockey Federation of Israel chair Alan Maislin on the phone from Portugal, where he represented Israel at the International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) meetings.

In three tilts at the tournament, the team didn't win a game, but they weren't embarrassed either, according to the players and their head coach, former Montreal Canadiens Stanley Cup winning coach Jean Perron.

"We had 45 minutes of training and we hit the ice and went," Perron said on the phone from the Canadiens' training camp. The team lost 6-0 (Spartak), 4-3 (Neman of Belarus) and 4-2 (Vienna) in their three games.

"We really didn't belong in the tournament," Perron added with a laugh. On short notice, the team was invited because of the good year they had – the Israeli team won the IIHF World Championship Division II tournament in Belgrade – and they scrambled to raise the money and put together a squad.

It was also a good promotional opportunity for Israeli hockey and the tournament benefited by welcoming back many of the Russian players that dot the Israeli roster.

It's the roster that probably turned the most heads. The Spartak Cup isn't an IIHF tournament, and thus Israel was viewed as a club team. That meant skaters didn't have to be Israeli to play, as they do in IIHF competitions.

Perron said they tried to invite only Jewish players, but Jewish pros like Detroit Red Wings' Mathieu Schneider, Los Angeles Kings forward Mike Cammalleri and prospects Eric Himelfarb (Detroit Red Wings) and Adam Henrich (Tampa Bay Lightning), to name a few, either couldn't make it or said no.

Perron bolstered the roster with a number of French Canadian players, none of whom ever played a game in the NHL but had no problem donning an Israeli jersey.

"The guys had a ball and had great team spirit," said Perron. "Those guys from Quebec mixed with Jewish guys."

"We tried to keep it kosher, but it got tough," Maislin said.

Even with the French skaters, Perron said the team was led by former Edmonton Oilers' first-round pick Michael Henrich, who is Jewish and Adam's older brother. He scored three of the team's five goals.

"He had an outstanding tournament. He was our best player," Perron said.

Henrich was joined on the top line by Max Birbraer, a native of Kazakhstan and the first Israeli ever to be drafted in the NHL, and Aaron Brand, a Jewish player from Toronto who plays professional hockey in the United Hockey League. Their line scored four of the five goals the Israeli team mustered.

"A lot of people didn't think we were going to be competitive," Henrich told The CJN. "It was fun. I was pretty happy to come and play and be a part of it."

For his part, Brand didn't even know that Israel had a legitimate hockey team. He played with Henrich for Canada at the 1997 Maccabiah Games. He has family in Israel and is now trying to get his Israeli passport so he can play in the World Championships.

"It was awesome to get on a plane and go to Moscow," Brand said. "We did really well. Everyone expected us to get killed."

Brand said it was interesting to learn about the conditions of Israeli hockey. He said the Israeli members on the team worried about breaking sticks and were recycling their tape. He said he learned a lot in Russia and now wants to play for Israel.

"I will see if I can get a passport. [If I knew] I would have tried to play 10 years before," he said.

Canadian and veteran Israeli hockey team member Ron Soreanu said seeing a group of French Canadian players line up on the blue line and listen to Hatikvah, was "kind of odd."

He added that the Israeli ambassador to Russia addressed the team in the dressing room during one game – in Hebrew.

"It was probably the first time they had ever heard that language in their lives," Soreanu said.

For Soreanu, who played only minor hockey in Toronto, the tournament was an opportunity to be exposed to some legitimate world-class competition.

"For guys like me who haven't played at this level before, we were treated and received well," he said. "Henrich and Brand are awesome players, so it was nice to be able to play with guys like that."

Perron said that while the experience was worth it and the promotional opportunity even better, the Israeli team will probably not be heading back to the Spartak Cup.

"It's a one-time thing. We need to put our money somewhere else. It was a great publicity stunt," he said.

York Racquets pro-am event nets more than $35,000

By MIRAY CHESKES-GRANOVSKY
Special to The CJN

The 2005 York Racquets Pro-Am Tennis Tournament has raised more than $35,000 for the Canada-Israel Children's Centres and Maccabi Canada.

The tournament also honoured Toronto real-estate developer Harold Green, who passed away last year. Green was a founder of York Racquets Tennis Club and an ardent supporter of the sports centres for Israeli youth.

Each of the tournament's 14 participants was paired with a tennis pro and played doubles against the other pro-am teams. Pro participants included former world top 50 men's singles player Andrew Sznajder, former Jamaican Davis Cup team member Karl Hale and Paul Beck of York Racquets.

Youth games out of New Orleans

ATLANTA — New Orleans will no longer be a host of the JCC Maccabi Games in 2006. New Orleans was to be the kickoff site of the four-city games next summer until Hurricane Katrina ravaged the city, the Atlanta Jewish Times reported. The other host cities are Phoenix; Stamford, Conn.; and Vancouver. New Orleans has yet to be replaced.

Government weighs risks of trans fats

By DR. ORLI GOLDBERG

Back to school means back to making some important decisions – not just about which courses to take or which extra-curricular activities to participate in – but about which meal to choose at the cafeteria or which snack to select from the vending machine.

Still, the need for willpower to opt for soup and a salad rather than pizza and fries may be a thing of the past. Foods laden with trans fats may be removed from the shelves of grocery stores and may be banned from fast food chains pending an upcoming review by a Canadian government task force.

Recently, trans fatty acids have been a topic of interest for government, the food industry, health professionals, consumers and the media, as more information becomes available concerning the negative health effects of these fatty acids.

Trans fats are found naturally in some animal-based foods, but are largely the result of manufacturers using the process of "partial hydrogenation" to transform liquid oils into semi-solid fats like shortening and margarine. There is strong scientific evidence to suggest that dietary trans fats increase the risk of developing heart disease, the leading cause of death in Canada.

In addition to costing lives, cardiovascular disease costs the Canadian economy more than $18 billion a year, according to a recent report by Health Canada. Consumption of trans fatty acids in Canada are among the highest in the world and exeeed levels recommended by health professional organizations and governments worldwide.

While fat is an important component of a healthy diet, consuming too much fat, especially saturated and trans fat, should be avoided. Fats in food are made up of four different types of fatty acids: polyunsaturated, monounsaturated, saturated and trans.

Although Canadians have reduced their total fat intake over the last 20 years, they are still consuming too much saturated and trans fat. These types of fat are of particular concern, because science has shown that consuming either saturated or trans fat raises the blood levels of LDL cholesterol (the "bad cholesterol" that causes plaque formation in arteries, thereby increasing risk of heart disease). Moreover, in addition to raising LDL cholesterol, trans fat also reduces the blood levels of HDL cholesterol (the "good cholesterol" that protects against heart disease).

In light of the concerns regarding the trans fatty acid content of the Canadian food supply and the related health implications, the Canadian government has recently made several efforts to reduce the levels of trans fat in Canadian food. Canada was the first country in the world to introduce mandatory labelling of trans fat in prepackaged foods – a policy that will be fully implemented by Dec. 12. Health Canada and the Heart and Stroke Foundation are working with a task force composed of various stakeholders to develop recommendations and strategies for reducing trans fats in Canadian foods to the lowest levels possible. The task force's report is expected to be released in the near future.

In the meantime, to help consumers make educated choices about trans fat, the task force has made the following recommendations:

- Look at the Nutrition Facts panel to help you choose products like margarines, snacks, cookies and crackers with less trans fat and saturated fat.
- Choose low-fat dairy products and leaner meats.
- Remember that not all fats are bad. Some fatty acids, like omega-3, are actually good for your heart and are an important part of a healthy diet.
- Making healthier food choices means more than just reducing trans fat. Be sure you are also selecting lower sodium and lower calorie products as well.

Although the government may protect us from the temptation of donuts, cookies and chips at some point in the near future, in the meantime, a healthy lifestyle begins with you.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

A friend of mine who teaches history once showed me the budget of a 17th-century Jewish community in Poland, and I was duly impressed that even before most businesses had planned finances, one of our shtetls already understood the value of such foresight. Of course, my own household doesn't have an annual budget, and I have always been torn between the efficiency of detailed planning and the creativity of spontaneous dreaming.

More and more, educational institutions are being asked to use the indicators of the world of commerce to evaluate their success, and herein looms a great danger.

As much as I am sometimes the culprit in demanding accountability of a particular school, I often question the norms that we use for measurement. It's all too easy to think of quantitative indicators such as enrolment statistics or retention data as proof of a school's success or failure when we know that the sacred space between a teacher's heart and mind and that of the student is what true education is all about.

It is equally tempting to think that a strategic plan projected in power point is what tells if a school is functioning well, when we know that profound Jewish values and their transmission from generation to generation is the only plan God has for us in this world.

Measurable outcomes are the very best indicators for a factory that produces computer chips, but how does one measure a story read by a teacher to a child in senior kindergarten that resonates 25 years later and changes one's perspective on life?

I remember hearing from a very senior Jewish Agency executive who was born in Russia that a tattered photocopy of the novel Exodus given to her at a 1970s party in Riga was what awoke her as a Jew. I know there was a budget to get those secret books into the Soviet Union, but did we know the outcome and did we have a way to measure it?

Schools must be accountable in the same way that, during this season of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, we are accountable, but neither schools nor humans can be counted in the same way as cars off an assembly line or ads on a billboard.

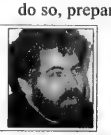
Yom Kippur vignettes

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER



Having a feast on the eve of Yom Kippur is as important a mitzvah as the fast that follows. However, I never seem to be satiated and prepared for the impending hunger that will haunt me a few hours into the fast. I know I will be starving soon – of course, some of my hunger will be simply because I won't be able to eat. It's a mental thing.

On the eve of Yom Kippur, traffic will be heavy on Bathurst Street – bustling like a shuk in Israel. As in previous years, I'll pretend I'm living in Israel, where pre-Yom Kippur commotion is everywhere.

It's Kol Nidrei night. Everyone in shul looks majestic – shirts ironed and skirts flowing. Yet their dapperness ends at their ankles, where scuffed running shoes and feathery slippers take over. The sight of well-dressed Jews wearing black high-tops is humorous. Only God could command such fashion cheekiness.

As a boy, I couldn't wait for the day when I would wrap my body in a tallit on the Day of Atonement. I watched the married men do so, preparing to go to a spiritual never-never-land. They would look down at their children, shoot a glance at their wives, stare skyward, and then pull the holy tallits over their heads. I knew these men would soon huddle in a metaphoric forest somewhere, closer to God, where they would pray hard to secure the heavenly "happy face" – the divine decree of "life" for the coming year.

Every bride is beautiful. Every chazzan on Yom Kippur sings like an angel – like Yossele Rosenblatt and Moshe Koussevitzky – two of the greatest chazzanim in history. As the noise softens in shul and the cantor begins the ominous Kol Nidrei prayer, his or her voice projects a depth of passion. This does not necessarily stem from the cantor's range or the length of time he or she can hold a note but more so from a very profound place in his or her soul, a source for the cantor's divine magic – like a 1,000-foot well with sweet water at its base.

I can't recall a stormy Yom Kippur morning. The sun always seems to shine throughout the day and a charming wind accompanies us, sometimes blowing softly through the shul if the shammas chooses to open the side doors.

As the day wears on, attractive women clutch their prayer books indifferent to the creases in their Chanel dresses; handsome men care little that the tails of their white shirts hang out the back of their suits. The elderly sit more often while the Ark is open, and parents seem desertly parched watching their children sip water from those throw-away containers.

It is Yom Kippur. A calm seriousness has set in while we see the day turn to dusk through the stained-glass windows. The day is about complete and God thoughtfully and slowly vacates the seat next to us, bringing closure to our day of meandering through an ethereal meadow with the Almighty; seeing a dimension of life that is only ours one day of the year. Forgiveness, introspection, prayer, good deeds. Who shall live and who shall die? We thought and talked about all of it.

The men have returned from the forest and they ease their prayer shawls off. We become more aware of the silliness of the flip-flops on our feet, creases in our clothing and gurgling in our guts. But something has changed. Something is different. Yom Kippur, the holiest of holiest days has come and gone, and the meaning of life and the the glow of our existence is somewhat clearer. Have an easy fast.

At the Granite Club, perfect-world wedding wish lists come true

In the world of wedding planning, there are wish lists and there are wish lists.

Then there's your wish list.

Since this is your special day, you've decided to eschew real-world expectations in favour of your most indulgent fantasies.

For starters, you'd like a state-of-the-art modern facility for up to 500 guests, ensconced in a historic setting.

You'd like this mythical edifice to be surrounded by magnificently landscaped lawns, gardens, and terraces. For good measure, you'd like the entire grounds to be encircled by several acres of virgin forest brimming with fauna — so spectacular they've been certified as conservation land by the American Audubon society.

Ever the hopeless romantic, you'd like this entire little Camelot — all 22 acres of it — to be located smack dab in the middle of Toronto, with ample onsite parking.

All this, and you haven't even entered the facility yet!

Once inside, the dreamer in you is just getting warmed up. You'd like your divine luncheon or dinner fare to be prepared in a palatial kitchen by an army of distinguished chefs. Since you want to have your cake and eat it too, dessert — and your wedding cake if you wish — should be the sole preoccupation of a full-time cake and pastry chef.

You fancy your reception taking place in a majestic 7,000 sq. ft. ballroom equipped with state-of-the art sound, lighting, and projection facilities. The entire north side of the room, bathed in natural light thanks to a panoramic glass wall, should give onto a magnificently landscaped stone terrace.

In other words, your venue should feature the ultimate in high tech, yet still retain the warmth and character of century-old surroundings.

You'd like to enjoy cocktails in a smaller, more intimate reception area, which gives onto yet another landscaped terrace. (Now is no time to take off your rose-coloured glasses!)

Immaculate furnishings and sumptuous appointments, however, merely whet your appetite for visual esthetics. You'd like to stroll through a permanent art gallery — featuring works by noted artists — as you move from room to room.

Having thus pushed the expectations envelope, why not also ask for valet parking, a dreamlike Victorian-style brides room, onsite daycare and babysitting services, and guestroom rates at a major luxury hotel for your guests?

Having come this far, in fact, why not simply ask for an open wish list?

Welcome to the Granite Club, where perfect-world wish lists come true. The opportunity to enjoy so much in one special place is proving irresistible to a growing number of simcha makers and event planners, especially since a recent $3 million renovation brought its banquet facilities up to speed with its historical ambience.

The level of simcha activity at this Bayview landmark, however, cannot be attributed to facilities alone; service also comes into play. "We're passionate about what we do," beams Catering Director Deborah Muise. "Every member of our team is focused on making your simcha the fairy-tale event you envisage."

Upholding the Granite Club's lofty standards and maximizing its clients' comfort zone is only part of achieving this goal, says Muise. The other part is creating awareness that for special events, the Granite Club welcomes the community and members alike. "We'd like to dispel any lingering notions that we're an "Old Boys' Club," says Muise. "We're a family place where traditions are built and generation after generation celebrates their simchas. We're honoured to have the opportunity to host yours."

Israel's quandary with Hamas

Palestinian women attend a recent Hamas rally in the former Gush Katif area of Gaza. Israeli officials are contemplating how best to deal with Hamas. They do not want their policies to boost Hamas in the eyes of Palestinian voters.

Israel faces a tempting opportunity to try to hurt Hamas, both militarily and politically.

In recent weeks, the Islamist terrorist group has suffered several setbacks and has lost points in Palestinian public opinion:

- Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar almost begged Israel not to continue punishing Gaza for a barrage of some 40 Qassam rockets that Hamas fired on the Israeli town of Sderot.
- Palestinian Authority (PA) police in Gaza imposed a ban on the public display of weapons by anyone outside the regular security forces.
- Hamas fared poorly in West Bank municipal elections, a far cry from the movement's victory in Gaza municipal elections in January.

What happened?

Analysis

The election results were an initial political indication that the more moderate ruling Fatah party would reap the immediate benefits of Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip this summer. Fatah now controls 51 of 104 municipalities, with Hamas winning only 13.

So are the good times over for Hamas? Far from it.

Analysts say the municipal elections had little connection to the withdrawal. Hamas' weakening was partly due to the fact that in many villages the dominant force is the family, not a political faction. Local groupings of large families or clans won control of some 40 councils, according to Jamal Shubaki, head of the PA's election commission.

Furthermore, Hamas has traditionally been weaker in the West Bank than in the Gaza Strip.

Sharps To Get Award

TORONTO — Isadore Sharp, head of the Four Seasons Hotel chain, and his wife Rosalie will be honoured Nov. 15 with a 2005 Philanthropy Award from the Association of Fundraising Professionals, Greater Toronto chapter, for their "contributions and active involvement in cultural, research and healthcare organizations across Canada." Their gifts include $5 million each to Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital and the Ontario College of Art and Design, and $20 million to the Toronto Opera House.

WORLD

Settlement Approved

MIAMI — A judge overruled appeals from 350 Holocaust survivors last month and affirmed a deal reached last spring in the Nazi "Gold Train" case. U.S. District Court Judge Patricia Seitz approved the allocation of $25.5 million in the case of a train full of goods looted by Nazis from Hungarian Jews and then confiscated by U.S. troops in 1945. Some $21 million of the money will go to social services for Hungarian Holocaust survivors in need. More than 40 per cent will go to survivors in Israel, 22 per cent to those in Hungary, 21 per cent to U.S. survivors and seven per cent to Canadians. The rest will fund legal fees, extra compensation for those who filed the suit and an archive about the case. The 350 dissenters argued the funds should go to all survivors.

Graves Found

STUTTGART— Construction work was halted Sept. 30 at the airport in Stuttgart, Germany, when Jewish leaders protested after a World War II-era mass grave was uncovered. It's believed dozens of slave labourers died there in 1944 or 1945 and were dumped in a trench and covered with dirt.

Cash for Security

NEW YORK— Thirty Jewish institutions in New York City received government money to help bolster security. The yeshivas and shuls got an average of $65,000 (US) each as part of a $7.3-million aid package to non-profit groups in the New York area. The money came from federal and state homeland security funds.

Shul Shooting in Fla.

BOCA RATON, Fla. — A 79-year-old man shot another man outside a Boca Raton shul during Rosh Hashanah services. Marc Benayer fired two shots into the chest of Jonathan Samuels, 44, on Oct. 4, critically wounding him, Associated Press reported. The men had argued about a woman, Marta Pinto, 52, who once lived with Benayer and worked for Samuels. Samuels had tried unsuccessfully to help Pinto get a restraining order against Benayer in 2004. She left the services before the shooting because she and her current boyfriend felt uncomfortable with Benayer there. Samuels ran back into the shul after being shot, then collapsed. He was in critical condition at a local hospital. Pinto, a convert, grew up in Colombia and once lived in Canada, the Palm Beach Post reported.

Leader of Palestinian Group Threatens Jews

ST. CATHARINES, Ont. — The president of the Niagara Palestinian Association was arrested and charged last month after he allegedly uttered an unspecified threat aimed at the Jewish community.

Police said Burhan Azzeh made the threat while at work in St. Catherines on Sept. 22, but they would not divulge details about the comments.

Azzeh spent one night in jail and was ordered to keep away from the B'nai Israel Synagogue in St. Catharines. He was also ordered to surrender his passport to police, stay in the Niagara region, and avoid "any function or protest where members of the Jewish community can reasonably be expected to be in attendance."

The arrest occurred a day after Susan Howard-Azzeh, his wife and co-president of the Niagara Palestinian Association, disrupted an open forum on Hamilton Police Chief Brian Mullan's involvement in a recent trip to Israel by Ontario law enforcement officials, but police said the two incidents are not related.

While Azzeh is not being charged under hate crime legislation, since he did not make threats to a specific individual, Insp. Brian Eckhardt of the Niagara Regional Police said police can still lay charges in the case of death threats, Niagara This Week reported.

His wife, who is also his lawyer, said he is not guilty.

Young, Poor, Kosher?

NEW YORK— Young and lower-income consumers are driving the U.S. kosher market, a new survey says. Some 70 per cent of respondents who said they "buy kosher occasionally" are between 18 and 34, while 67 per cent earn less than $30,000 (US) annually. Some 86,000 U.S. products were hechshered in 2004, up from 75,000 in 2002. The poll was released ahead of the 17th annual Kosherfest, to be held Nov. 15 and 16 in New York.

Toronto Jewish culture to experience 'rejewvenation'

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A four-day event that will celebrate the resurgence of Ashkenazi Jewish culture in downtown Toronto, through theatre, music, art and lectures by Jewish North American and European scholars, will kick off at the end of the month.

Rejewvenation: The Futures of Jewish Culture, sponsored by the Chancellor Jackman Fund, is the first conference of its kind in North America, said Andrea Most, a professor in the English department of the University of Toronto, and one of three organizers.

Most, along with two colleagues, Anna Shternshis, a Yiddish and literature professor, and Louis Kaplan, an art history professor, organized the event to educate the public about Ashkenazi culture by incorporating elements of art, literature and music.

"We're interested in looking at the broad spectrum of Jewish culture. The word 'rejewvenation' implies a kind of renaissance, but largely with Ashkenazi culture. It is a development of culture in North America and Europe that has changed radically and dramatically in the last 10 to 15 years," Most said.

The highlighted events include a month-long art exhibition in Kensington Market called "Command J: Jewish Laws, Digital Arts." It will feature work by four internationally renowned artists who examine issues related to Judaism.

"These are thoughtful and provocative works raising important questions for traditional Jewish laws and commandments, whether it be Jeffrey Shaw on the Second Commandment, Melissa Shiff on the rite of circumcision, Simon Glass on the Ten Commandments, or Helene Aylon on the Torah in general," wrote Kaplan, the organizer of the art exhibit, on the Rejewvenation website.

"But, even more importantly, these artists and their works are delving into Jewish law, ethics and ideas of justice to help us think about and imagine possible Jewish futures."

Another performance to look out for is The Rebbetzin's Tisch: A Storahtelling Ritual Performance created by Amichai Lau-Lavie, an Israeli-born mythologist, storyteller and teacher of Judaic literature.

"Storahtelling" is meant to promote Jewish culture and history through theatrical performances rather than sermons.

"The Rebbetzin's Tisch is an over-the-top character doing a parshah. This is a very different way of approaching the Jewish community," Most said.

Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, a performance studies professor, as well as a Hebrew and Judaic studies professor at New York University, will open the performance with a lecture titled "Rebel All You Like… Just be Jewish."

Queer Jewish Weddings is another performance featured in the Rejewvenation festivities that "explores the cultural, historical, emotional and comical aspects of queer Jewish weddings."

The show will include live klezmer music by Frank London and Lorin Sklamberg of the Klezmatics, pianist Marilyn Lerner, Yiddish singer and actress Adrienne Cooper and theatre artist Sara Felder.

Rejewvenation will close with a conference, which will include lectures, panels and discussions with more than 30 scholars from around the world on various aspects of contemporary Jewish culture.

Most said while each event and lecture focuses on the Jewish culture in Toronto, she expects that Rejewvenation will draw a diverse range of people, from non-Jewish to observant.

"One of the things to notice is a blurring of lines between religious and secular culture."

She added that the issue of gender and sexuality is sure to get attention, as well as the relationship between "cutting-edge culture and 20th-century Zionism."

"We want to start a discussion of Jewish scenes, we want to have a conversation between Europe and North America and we want to highlight and celebrate the downtown Jewish culture."

The conference, which runs from the weekend of October 28-31, will include Shabbaton elements. People can register to stay in a hotel in the area at a conference rate and take part in the lectures and presentations.

Self, sisters, family, the world

Some of the places we find sanctuary from the inevitable bruising from the hard-scrabble, consumer-obsessed lifestyle of large-city North America are the myriad family and other relationships that are the weave of the blanket that enwraps our self-esteem and sense of self-worth.

Sometimes that blanket enfolds us just right, providing perfect protection and comfort. At times, though, it can smother or fit so loosely that it slides from our shoulders as if it had never been there at all.

From the editor's desk

But none of us, anywhere on earth, can lead a life of any meaning without the availability of that blanket of relationships, however imperfect its fit.

You Made Me Love You, by Joanna Goodman (Penguin Canada), is a novel that explores precisely that theme. It depicts the complex weave of the imperfect relations among three sisters as they contend with the unceasing pressures of their vastly different lives.

Estelle, a struggling film editor in Hollywood, Jesse, an unhappy housewife but successful businesswoman in Toronto and Erica, a dejected and oft-rejected writer in Manhattan, are the children of Milt and Lilly Zarr. Milt is a former entertainment icon in Canada. His marriage to Lilly carries a not-so-secret secret that brings far-reaching consequences upon his family.

The narrative unfolds across a brief but critical period of time in which significant events occur in each of the main figures' lives. The book is constructed as if it were a television series. Each chapter is a new scene that puts into place increasingly interlocking pieces of each character's "puzzle." Eventually all the pieces align into the novel's final denouement.

Last month, The CJN met with Goodman, over coffee, to discuss her work. The vivacious, thirtysomething author grew up in Montreal and studied journalism at Carleton University in Ottawa. It was there that she found and honed her creative writing skills. Her first novel, Belle of the Bayou, grew out of her thesis for the radio programming component of her journalism degree.

You Made Me Love You is Goodman's second novel. She is currently at work on her third, "a darker reflection on marriage," which is scheduled to be published in the spring of 2007.

"I love writing books," Goodman enthused. "I have always been a writer." That love is manifest in a clear mastery at penning dialogue, by turns, droll and laconic, sharp and biting, but always realistic.

"Dialogue comes very easy to me. I try to make the characters sound real," Goodman said.

Joanna Goodman

Some of the dialogue though, she admitted, did not spring from her imagination. "Some of the conversations in the book came from real-life experience and conversations" of friends and family.

The characters are composites of a number of people, primarily the cousins with whom she grew up in Montreal. Indeed the relationships among the three sisters were also inspired by the author's relationships with her two cousins. Their depiction in the book, however, is exaggerated as a literary device to delineate the terrain of the individual sisters' personalities. Goodman also uses dialogue to good comedic effect. For example, Lilly offers this sage advice to Erica.

"Still. You're 28. You should be thinking about it. It's good to get marriage over with and out of the way. Like brushing your teeth in the morning. Then you don't have to think about it anymore."

But the novel is not a comedy. Nor is it prescriptive of solutions for the many general or Jewish problems of modern urban life. The Jewishness of the family, in fact, is mostly portrayed in stereotypes of the nouveau riche. Milt and Lilly are garish materialists.

The sisters have no meaningful Jewish content in their lives to speak of, except for Erica, in a later turn of the plot that is both unpredictable and rewarding. When asked about this portraiture, Goodman responded that she painted the world that she knew. The book is a portrait of three women "who were on a path to try to please the world. But they ultimately decide to pursue their own destiny."

We see the effect of their decisions on the course of their lives, how they arrive at those decisions and how they subsequently deal with the consequences.

Goodman describes herself as "passionate and creative." She should have also added well organized and disciplined. For in addition to being an author, she is a wife, a mother and a businesswoman. When working on a novel, she mostly writes at night.

But she does not complain about the demands on her time. She revels in them.

"I feel for anyone who does not have a passion. What I believe is the life you have is your creation. If you put your heart in it, you can have it, if you do the footwork. But things don't necessarily come on your timeline. They come on God's timeline. I really believe God delivers eventually. There's no way I could lead this life without a belief in God."

Goodman's motto, if I could call it that, is, "Ask. Believe. Receive." Implied, of course, before "Receive" is "Work hard!" which she does, to the readers' benefit.

War on terror to enter new phase, says Pipes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When Daniel Pipes spoke at York University in 2003, more than 100 police were on hand to provide security, including five on horseback. A detective, "with some embarrassment," read to him Canada's hate crimes law, which prohibits the promotion of hatred against an identifiable group.

This time around, no one read him the law, Pipes quipped to a receptive audience at the Sephardic Kehila Centre.

Surrounded by 800 friendly faces and a much smaller number of police and security personnel, Pipes tackled a topic that may still have caused a dust-up if it was addressed on campus: Islam and the war on terror.

The July 7 bombings in London marked a new phase in the war with radical Islam – the recognition by policy-makers that "the strategic enemy is Islamist violence," Pipes said.

Even after 9/11, the enemy was defined as terror and "the ideological dimension remained abstract."

But with the London attacks and others in Beslan, Madrid and Israel, a new era has begun. "The Pentagon now defines the threat as extremist Sunni and Shia movements that exploit Islam for political reasons," Pipes said.

Pipes is author of a dozen books, is a widely published columnist and serves as director of the Middle East Forum, a U.S. think-tank. He is also founder of Campus Watch, a controversial organization that reviews and monitors Middle East studies on North American campuses. His critics accuse him of fomenting intolerance of Islam and of inhibiting academic freedom.

He spoke at an educational forum sponsored by Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center.

In his address, Pipes described radical Islam as the opponent of democratic societies. It is an 80-year-old phenomenon that "is a response to modern stresses and strains by Muslims," he said.

It originated in the 1920s when ideologies like fascism and communism were also attractive. They shared a goal of using governments to control all aspects of society. Radical Islamists see the United States as their main obstacle.

Radical Islam's war against the United States started in 1979 when the U.S. embassy in Tehran was seized. Numerous attacks against western interests followed, including the first World Trade Center attack in 1993. Though only six died, the attack could have caused tens of thousands of casualties, he said.

Until 9/11, these attacks seemed "more like mosquito bites than very serious problems" and the response of the West was to treat them as law enforcement issues.

The 9/11 attack took the conflict to a new level – one in which U.S. President George W. Bush identified the conflict as a "war on terror."

The 7/7 attacks by homegrown Islamics escalated the conflict again and Pipes predicted the emerging conflict will enter yet another phase – one of ideas, of textbooks, of influence over all aspects of peoples' lives.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair recognized that when he stated, following the 7/7 bombings, that Britain was confronting an "evil ideology."

Pipes argued that radical Islam, whether violent or non-violent, presents an ideological challenge to the West. "I believe the ideology of radical Islam is a powerful one, a coherent one." It offers its own unique way of seeing life. At its core, it is fundamentally anti-democratic, anti-modern, anti-woman, anti-Semitic, anti-American and it seeks world hegemony, he said.

The problem, he continued, is not Islam itself, nor terror on its own, but a body of ideas that are comparable in sweep and scope to fascism and communism.

Traditional barometers of power like armies, wealth, territory and resources are "an outdated yardstick" to rely on in the conflict. Instead, the conflict will turn on values like solidarity, courage and morale, he said.

Pipes pointed to several examples of the new frontier in the conflict with radical Islam, where its adherents work to promote the "privileging" of Islam that doesn't exist for other religions.

In one case in Britain, radical cleric Abdullah el-Faisal, a convert to Islam, was convicted of soliciting murder and encouraging racial hatred. He successfully convinced the trial judge to exclude Jews and Hindus from the jury.

In Britain, polygamy is recognized as valid for tax purposes.

Eventually, radical Islamics will recognize that violence doesn't work, while tactics like intimidation, conversion, privileging, lobbying and educating are more effective, he said.

In a question and answer session Pipes said:

- He is no fan of Israeli strategy vis-a-vis Hamas, a radical Islamic organization that is a spinoff from the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood. Israelis don't seem to appreciate the dangers posed by radical Islam.
- The recent rapprochement with Pakistan is a "a very constructive development."
- Canadians must get active, engage in a "counter-jihad" and research what local Muslim preachers say in their mosques.
- Western societies have not taken the threat from radical Islam seriously enough.

Funeral held for Ross

The funeral for murder victim Alicia Ross was held Friday, Oct. 7, at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue. Burial was at Pardes Shalom Cemetery in Vaughan.

Ross disappeared from her home in Markham, Ont., on Aug. 16. Her remains were discovered five weeks later, when neighbour Daniel Sylvester came forward and spoke to police.

The Alicia Ross Memorial Fund has been established to send children on canoe trips to Algonquin Provincial Park.

Because of holiday deadlines, a complete report on the funeral will appear in the Oct. 20 issue of CJN.

Manji outlines women's case against sharia

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An incident years ago when she was working in television news helped set best-selling author Irshad Manji on the path to a critical evaluation of the role of women in Islam.

Just as she was working to deadline, she received a note from a senior executive referring to a news story from Nigeria about a 17-year-old girl who had been sentenced to 180 lashes for being raped. "How could her faith justify that treatment?" the note inquired.

Manji admitted her initial reaction was to get defensive about Islam, but she soon realized the question was legitimate. Lowering her defences, she committed herself to investigate the role of women in contemporary Muslim societies.

Manji's investigation, her description of how it led to the publication of her provocative book The Trouble With Islam Today, and her opposition to proposed sharia-based arbitration in Ontario, were the subject of a fascinating talk at a lunchtime meeting of the Jewish Civil Rights Association, held recently at the law offices of Heenan Blaikie.

Manji said she was heartened that in Ontario, the "number 1 opponent to sharia was Muslim women." Likewise in France, Muslim women favoured the government's ban of the hijab, a traditional Muslim head dress for women.

In neither case, she suggested, were Muslim women opposing Islam or the Qur'an, Islam's holy book.

"They were protesting how the Qur'an will be interpreted through the cultural filter of honour," she said.

Manji said traditional Arab tribal culture has become "enmeshed" within Islam, resulting in an erosion of the status of women and female-unfriendly interpretation of scripture.

Irshad Manji

There is "nothing inherent within Islam that women are inferior," she stated. However, the concept of honour in Arab tribal tradition mandates that women "give up their individuality to maintain the reputation of men."

Under the logic of "honour," a woman's life is not her own, but belongs to a wider group such as her family and tribe. In Saudi Arabia, for example, women have the status of possessions – like cars – and can be passed from father to husband to son. If a woman dishonours her family, she can be killed by a male relative in an "honour killing," she said.

In Pakistan today, there are on average two honour killings a day.

Dishonouring the family could include being the victim of a rape, as was the case with the 17-year-old Nigerian girl. Despite presenting seven witnesses to prove she had been raped, she received the 180-lash sentence because her tribe's reputation had been tarnished, Manji said.

Had Islamic law been given legal status in Canada, some crimes would have been treated as family matters to be decided by the application of Islamic law, despite assurances that sharia's application would have to conform to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, she said.

Muslim women in Ontario know, as did those in France, that by removing the possibility of sharia adjudication, their rights would be enhanced. Within their communities, they could argue they had no choice but to comply with the prevailing civil standard. That could free them from intimidation and bullying by men for not complying with sharia laws or, in the case of France, for not wearing the hijab.

Manji, recipient of the Simon Wiesenthal Award of Valor, said opponents of these tribal traditions should expect rough treatment from the traditions' supporters.

"You will from time to time be called racist. Get used to it," she advised.

But, she continued, in the last 100 years, more Muslims have been imprisoned, raped and murdered by fellow Muslims than by Western imperialists. If Canadians speak out for human rights in Muslim countries, "it will help Muslims there."

Manji said she hopes Islam will generate its own internal debate that will reduce the grip of fundamentalists. "Only within Islam today is literalism mainstream worldwide." Muslims "accept that the Qur'an is like God 3.0 and none shall come after it." That has led to a "superiority complex" that has emboldened extremists and inhibited moderates, she said.

"Muslims are left with the feeling that questioning jihadists out loud is like questioning the Qur'an out loud, and that is a no-no."

Publication of her book and its availability in numerous languages, including Arabic, has prompted the creation of underground discussion clubs. She said she had established Project Ijtihad, a leadership network for young Muslims, to challenge authoritarianism, share information and restore critical thinking to Islam. More about Project Ijtihad is available at Manji's website www.muslim-refusenik.com.

In a question period, Manji commented about Muslims' perception of Jews.

"Muslims are taught that Jews used to be good people, but they corrupted the Torah," while Christians' belief in the trinity is seen as a corruption of monotheism, she said.

Muslims believe that when Jews and Christians accept Islam, they will "revert," not convert, to the true faith, she added.

Iran warned, the West forewarned

Last month, as part of a visiting delegation of Israel lawmakers, Israeli Knesset member Yossi Lapid urged a group of legislators in Washington that the West must take the necessary steps to appropriately oversee, if not actually bring to a halt Iran's nuclear program.

He even hinted that Israel would act alone, if western resolve failed. "We sacrificed six million Jews because the western world did not understand what Hitler intended. We are not willing to sacrifice another six million Israelis because the world does not understand the mullahs of Iran."

He spoke forcefully, albeit as a private individual and not on behalf of the government of Israel. But the point he made was well understood by all who heard him: Iran is to be carefully watched, not to be trusted, and made to behave according the norms of civilized nations.

Last week, there was more confirmation of Iran's dangerous deceit and malevolence in the international arena. Speaking to the press last Thursday, British Prime Minister Tony Blair said that Iran was probably involved in the violent campaign against Allied troops in southern Iraq. He indicated that new explosive devices used "not just against British troops but elsewhere in Iraq… lead us either to Iranian elements or to Hezbollah." He warned Tehran to sty out of Iraq. "There is no justification for Iran or any other country interfering in Iraq."

The prime minister spoke more equivocally in public than his official did in private the day before who said there was evidence that Iran's Revolutionary Guard had given Iraqi insurgents powerful armour-piercing technology, originally obtained from Hezbollah. That new technology has been used in a series of attacks that have killed eight British troops in southern Iraq.

Blair also had the clear-mindedness to tie Iran's involvement in Iraq with its intransigence on nuclear development. "Britain would not be subject to any intimidation in raising the necessary… issues to do with the nuclear weapons obligations of Iran under the Atomic Energy Agency treaty," the British prime minister said.

Earlier the same day, U.S. President George W. Bush also spoke out against Tehran. In a speech to the National Endowment for Democracy in Washington, Bush vowed to end Iranian and Syrian support of terror organizations.

"We're determined to deny radical groups the support and sanctuary of outlaw regimes. State sponsors like Syria and Iran have a long history of collaboration with terrorists and they deserve no patience from the victims of terror. The United States makes no distinction between those who commit acts of terror and those who support and harbour them because they're equally guilty of murder."

Let us hope that Blair and Bush and for that matter, Canadian Prime Minister Paul Martin too, understand the gravity of Lapid's warning last month in Washington.

The Tulchinskys

Your two-part article about Ted and Joan Tulchinsky ("An idealist and his history," From the editor's desk, CJN, Sept. 22 and 29) brought back many fond memories of Camp Hagshama and Biluim, where many of us became Zionists, but only some, such as Ted, were able to realize their dream of settling in Israel.

Coincidentally, Hagshama's successor, Camp Kinneret-Biluim, is presently searching for alumni. We are approaching the 65th anniversary of Camp Hagshama. Unfortunately, an office fire destroyed all of our alumni records prior to 1984.

PA authority funding

Canadian Prime Minister Paul Martin shook Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's hand and congratulated him on "the successful withdrawal from Gaza and the northern west bank." Martin also pledged $24.5 million of our tax dollars to the Palestinian Authority ("Martin commends Israel, pledges new money to PA," CJN, Sept. 22). Where does he get the temerity for such an act? This in addition to $12.2 million in May, when PA President Mahmoud Abbas visited Ottawa – for a grand total this year of $36.7 million.

One question: how much did Martin offer Israel to help with the withdrawal? Or does he only worry about Palestinian murderers?

Jews with the surname "Pardo"

I wish to inform you that I took my Y-DNA (male) test and the results show that I am a direct descendant of the kohanim.

This is very good news because I was told all those with the surname Pardo are related to each other, so I wish to convey this news to all "Pardo" families everywhere, even those who now have other surnames, so that they can find their roots. There is only a five per cent possibility of being a kohen, a member of the family of high priests of Israel, for Jewish "Pardos." Many of them converted because of the Spanish Inquisition and other circumstances.

I will be happy to recommend companies that test for Jewish ancestry and the gene for kohanim. Also, I want to write a book about "Pardo" families. If you have any information, please e-mail pardoinfo@ono.com.

Community should fight anti-Semitism

We are becoming complacent because we lead a materialistic life and everything else is secondary. In yesteryears, the landsmanshaft and the Zionist organizations of all kinds were a lot more active in the community and were, on a number of occasions, called upon to participate in an organized fashion to quell anti-Semitic incidents before they became of concern to us here in Toronto. Many of these organizations now exist in name only or are inactive, for the simple reason that they failed to attract younger elements to their fold. Where are the younger people?

When Chafeek El-Hout, the first Palestine Liberation Organization observer at the United Nations, visited Toronto and was supposed to speak at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, he was whisked away by police without uttering a word. This was thanks to the landsmanshaft and Zionist organizations. By the way, I was the one who assembled them and planned our strategy for that evening. We did our duty and we were not "Frozen Jews."

We confronted John Beattie, who founded the Canadian Nazi party in 1965, and his Nazi cronies in Allan Gardens in Toronto.

The landsmanshaft and Zionist organizations played an important role in holding rallies and peaceful demonstrations against anti-Semitism.

Nowadays, we read statistics about anti-Semitism, but, of necessity, we need tangible collective, active efforts. The community must organize a united campaign to combat anti-Semitism wherever it shows its head. It must be faced with deeds and not solely with empty words of condemnation.

The power of Kol Nidrei

By CANTOR DEBORAH STAIMAN

The synagogue is filled on the eve of Yom Kippur. The rabbi and the cantor are dressed in white. The entire congregation grows silent as the Ark is opened. All the Torah scrolls are taken from the Ark. Then, the familiar, haunting melody of Kol Nidrei is chanted by the cantor. The congregation experiences a rush of emotions and feelings – but how does one explain these feelings?

It is difficult to describe the myriad feelings that I, as a cantor, feel while chanting Kol Nidrei. As I pray, I am transported to many worlds – to the past, present and future. I am praying for myself and on behalf of my congregation. There is an unimaginable attempt to send this sacred text and melody up to God, for it is the beginning of the Day of Atonement, and the importance of connecting with God is unquestionable.

As the sifrei Torah are taken out of the Ark, enveloping and protecting me like soft blankets, they are comforting signs that support comes to us through God's teachings. The responsibility of protecting His teachings becomes so immediately present that I feel numb, and standing on the bimah becomes difficult because God's presence is so overwhelming. A deeply religious feeling drowns everything else. What gives Kol Nidrei its enormous power?

I have observed that many Jewish people consider Kol Nidrei the spiritual highlight of the liturgy during the High Holy Day period – perhaps even in the yearly cycle of holidays. Most can either hum the first musical motif or identify its melody. However, very few can account for its actual content.

Kol Nidrei is an Aramaic declaration, meaning "all vows." It states that all personal vows and oaths that a person makes unwittingly, rashly or unknowingly during the year should be considered null and void since these types of vows would have been difficult to fulfil.

It is interesting to note that Kol Nidrei acquired particular significance during the period of persecutions in Spain when some 100,000 Jews were forced to forswear the Jewish faith and adopt Christianity. The Kol Nidrei prayer was used by these secret Jews, or Marranos, as they were called, to renounce the vows that had been imposed upon them by the Inquisition.

The text and chant of Kol Nidrei was introduced by Rav Yehuda Gaon in his synagogue during the eighth century. According to the musicologist Eric Werner, it originally had a different function and certainly a different melody than we know in its present form.

During the 12th and 13th centuries, the Ashkenazi rabbis decided that each holiday should have its own unique melody that would express the significance of the day. The birthplace of the tunes chosen was southwestern Germany in the cities of Worms, Mayence, Speyer and the Rhineland, which were the centres of talmudic Judaism and the Ashkenazi ritual during the that period. Many of the melodies were written during the Crusades as laments of martyrology.

While most of the lament texts were forgotten, their tunes were absorbed by some of the prayers of the High Holy Days and festivals. They were given sacred status and called mi-Sinai tunes, which means, literally, "from Sinai," that is, "received by Moses on Mt. Sinai." Among these mi-Sinai tunes is a motif from Kol Nidrei whose exact origin is unknown. Note that the touching melody adopted by the Ashkenazim throughout the world is not used by Sephardi and Oriental Jews, who recite Kol Nidrei in a different manner.

Despite the fact that many synagogue-goers are not familiar with the specific content of Kol Nidrei, the melody of this prayer sparks intense feelings. Although the traditional Ashkenazi melody heard in synagogues today is very moving and has become one of the most treasured melodies of Ashkenazi Jews, it is not the melody alone that gives Kol Nidrei its power. After all, had this melody provided the musical setting for another prayer, it is unlikely that the melody alone would have taken on such extraordinary importance. So we must ask: What is it that provokes this deeply religious feeling? What gives Kol Nidrei its power?

Leopold Pilichowski (1864 — 1933) depicts the emotion and the power of Kol Nidrei and the Yom Kippur service it ushers in, as noted by Cantor Staiman, in his painting Day of Atonement.

I suspect that the chanting of Kol Nidrei during the Days of Awe has become a musical symbol for a moment in time when most Jewish people are highly aware of their Jewishness. The Torah scrolls are out of the Ark and we are all standing together as we did at Sinai to receive the commandments. At that moment, this sacred motif arises from the human voice. Kol Nidrei is sounded at the moment when Jews are all doing the same thing. They are standing facing the Torah scrolls, listening to a mi-Sinai tune, a melody received by Moses on Mount Sinai, which brings every Jew that much closer to God. It is a moment when every Jew has the potential to connect to the Jewish People, Torah and God.

A community in this state of closeness is thereby renewing the Jewish people's covenant with God. Once again, many Jews are taking part in sacred history, symbolically playing out the traditional Torah reading on Yom Kippur, a passage found in the Book of Deuteronomy, 29:9-14, titled "Nitzavim," from the Hebrew word which means "to stand firmly," with total commitment: "You stand this day, all of you, before the Lord your God – the heads of your tribes, your elders and officers, everyone in Israel, men, woman and children, and the strangers in your camp, from the one who chops your wood to the one who draws your water – to enter into the sworn covenant which the Lord your God makes with you this day in order to establish you henceforth as the people whose only God is the Lord, as you had been promised and as God had sworn to your fathers, to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. And it is not with you alone that I make this sworn covenant. I make it with those who are standing here with us today before the Lord our God, and equally with all who are not here with us today."

Kol Nidrei is a powerful moment of community during which we are not only united with those Jews in the synagogue, but we are aware that at the same moment, Jews all over the world, whether Orthodox, Conservative or Reform, are standing – physically, mentally and spiritually – listening to those same strains of sacred melody. Consciously or unconsciously, we know that this has been a practice for more than 1,000 years of Jewish history and that this practice will continue as long as the Jewish People lives and continues to stand firm in its commitment to the message of God's teachings.

Every Jew makes a difference in prolonging the life of the Jewish People by becoming part of this sacred history, through praying, studying and engaging in acts of lovingkindness. May you and your family be blessed with a healthy, peaceful and spiritual New Year, filled with your commitment to stand firmly before God.

Born and raised in Toronto, Cantor Deborah Staiman received investiture as a cantor from Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in 1991.

Victims no more

"A Jew walks along the streets of Minsk (or was it Pinsk)? A bird flying above relieves itself right on his head. He looks up plaintively and says, 'Far de goyim zingen zey' [For the goyim they sing].'"

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

So begins an important essay by Bernard Susser, a political science professor at Bar Ilan University, called "The Ideology of Affliction: Reconsidering the Adversity Thesis." It appears in a book on Jewish identity, Diaspora and Exile, edited by Howard Wettstein.

Susser believes that "historiography that portrays Jewish history as a series of unrelenting tragedies has been partially discredited." Hence the need to reconsider the adversity thesis. But the news does not seem to have reached the Jewish public. Thus, he writes, though "there are virtually no areas of American life that are closed to Jews because of discrimination, two-thirds of American Jews continue to believe otherwise."

The figure is probably even higher in Canada, where most Jews refuse to accept that they, like Jews elsewhere in the world, have never had it so good. Many of us, with personal or inherited memories of persecution and pogroms, still take it for granted that even the birds discriminate against us.

Jewish groups often perpetuate what Susser calls "a striking dissonance between the cultural assumptions of the tradition and the reality with which they are familiar." That is the ethos they promote in the Diaspora, and they present Israel as a country in perpetual and imminent danger of extinction.

The fact that Israelis see themselves as citizens of a minor superpower that can face its adversaries with confidence does not sit well in the Diaspora. Hence our alarmist analyses and pathetic appeals for support.

We like to be victims, because that has been inculcated in us and because we erroneously believe it will help us keep our children Jewish. But the opposite seems to be true. The new generation will want to embrace Judaism for positive, intrinsic reasons, not as a way of fighting their parents' demons.

This is, of course, not to say that anti-Semitism has disappeared, only that Jews can nowadays look after themselves and that they live in countries where the state itself is combating it.

Jews have come to play an important part in the countries they live in and where they are at home. Even those who are lukewarm about Jewish practices tend to identify with the Jewish people. "Modernity," writes Susser, "means the movement from destiny to choice." A growing number of today's Jews, whether or not born to Jewish parents, are Jews by choice.

It is the most sober and wholesome way to stay Jewish. To style ourselves as victims may be a greater menace than anti-Semitism.

Technology overload

Today a cellphone rang. It rang in a hallway, like many other university hallways, packed with students on their way to and from classes. All at once 40 people raised their cellphones to their ears and as one asked, "Hello?" Welcome to an everyday event, what I think of as "the synchronized telephone."

Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

With a population of approximately 32 million, Canada has more than 13- million cellular phone subscribers, more than one-third of the population. Walking around in a university is like walking around in a microwave oven, the air so thick with radio waves that sometimes you imagine you can see them. Sometimes they even melt any chocolate bars that you keep in your pocket. Well, I'm pretty sure that's why they melt.

It all comes down to new toys. Everyone loves to have new toys. Even the most mature man looks like a 10-year-old when the cashier rings through his new 10-million horsepower belt sander, or nine-zillion-inch HDTV-ready television. Of course, university students as a whole are not really very mature, so we don't have to disguise our love of toys.

We have so many toys and we use them so often that even with all the time-saving features we are always busy. What used to be a morning commute to school is now a conference call. What used to be reading a book is now reading an e-book while checking our e-mail and paying bills online while music is playing and having instant messaging conversations with a minimum of 16 people.

I have to have a cellphone. It's essential. Really. How else would I be reachable in case my friends need to talk about other friends, in case my family wants to reach me while I'm on the way to school, in case my car breaks down in the wilderness and I need a weapon to fend off the wild animals and maybe even call for help? It even has games on it for those moments when I am utterly bored and have nothing to do but productive work!

Of course, no activity can be done without the requisite background music, so I have to carry my MP3 player with me, which fortunately holds about 100 hours of music. Maybe I'll even take the power cord for it, in case I spontaneously decide to travel somewhere and I need to listen to all 100 hours of music. Oh, can't forget to mention the massively oversized headphones that make me look like some kind of alien while they blast music at nine-trillion decibels at everyone around me.

I also have my digital camera and its transfer cable, in case I need to take some pictures for school (it happens once in a blue moon, but it never hurts to be ready, right) and put them on a computer so that I can quickly make a formal presentation or assignment out of anything I see at any given moment.

The laptop that the presentation is designed on weighs more than a small (metal) dog, and of course, is accompanied by an electrical adapter that I suspect is lined with lead or perhaps some heavy rock. The laptop doesn't really comfortably fit on anyone's lap, and the bottom heats up to the approximately 900 degrees, hot enough to seriously roast the family chestnuts, but I'm sure that during a cold winter's day it could undoubtedly save me from freezing to death, at least for two hours until the battery runs out.

The main event is weightlifting, carrying all your gadgets to wherever it is you are going, and being as careful as possible not to break all those plastic-shelled fragile electronics. The five-minute walk from my house to the bus stop might feel like a full-fledged hike, and sometimes I feel the need to make camp for the night, but I can always preheat my laptop to 350 degrees while I go looking for a squirrel.

Coming together

When you move to a new city, you can take advantage of an immense array of opportunities. However, the positives that come with entering a brand new city like Halifax, as I did, also make you think about the great things you left back home.

Matthew Pottens in Halifax

As the High Holy Days quickly approached, I, and many friends I spoke to, couldn't help but wonder if we could achieve the same feeling of family, togetherness and overall unity that have always been available to us at home, during the holiday season.

At a university with 10,000 or more students, who practise every religion known to man, I find myself realizing that we, the Jewish students at Dalhousie, are a minority. Actually, according to the Jewish Student Association's (JSA) statistics, the Jewish student population at Dalhousie represents 3.5 per cent of the overall student population.

Passing through the Dalhousie Student Union Building (the SUB) last month, I was caught off guard. The week beginning Monday, Sept. 19, was Palestine Education Week, which was run by the Palestinian Solidarity Society. Seeing a large information booth decorated with the Palestinian flag, I became interested and began reading.

It turned out that the information booth consisted mostly of quotes. It was my perception that the anti-Israel sentiment was strong and some information was suspect. Many quotes were missing context and the overall tone seemed one-sided. Where was the voice from the middle ground? Putting the information aside, when I took my eyes off their setup, I realized I was the only Jewish person around. I felt like a minority.

The Palestinian Solidarity Society had come together, organized and formed what they believed to be a well put together information centre for thousands of Dalhousie students with varying degrees of knowledge on the subject. Where was the other side of the issue? Whether it was intended or not, I truly felt alone, unwelcome and out of place.

These feelings persisted for a day or two until Friday night rolled around. The JSA was hosting one of its weekly Shabbat dinners, and it was at this dinner that I had an epiphany. Yes, the Jewish students at Dal, like the Jewish people all over the world, are a minority, and there is little we can do about that. However, at events like the JSA's Friday night dinners, we come together and create our own sense of solidarity.

While we also have forums for public education, and politics to debate, at this time in my life, I'm more comfortable expressing my religious and political beliefs in a more private setting, as opposed to publicly. Both approaches are acceptable, and both approaches achieve the same goal more or less – the coming together of a united group of people, experiencing their own sense of identity. I do believe that one goal for Jews and Palestinians alike is the need to strive to be aware of both sides of the issue: building bridges, not alienating each other.

The Friday night dinners, comically dubbed the "Jew-BQ," and the soon-to-begin Monday night basketball at the nearby Chabad synagogue are great opportunities for the Jewish students of Dal to experience their sense of Jewish identity around campus.

Jason Freedman, a third-year arts student, commented, "It's a wonderful opportunity for our community to come together and exercise our social and physical abilities… I mean, I need to get some exercise once in a while."

At the Sept. 23 Shabbat dinner, there were close to 60 young men and woman mingling, eating and enjoying each other's company… along with the free food.

Josh Kaminsky, a third-year political science major, said, "Home is not a set geographic location for me, home is where my friends and family are. Having my younger brother, longtime friends and activities like JSA basketball allow me to feel at home, even in Halifax."

While not all of us can be together to enjoy the traditions of celebrating the holidays with close family and friends, there are opportunities on campus that make for a rich Jewish life. Perhaps one wish for Palestinians and Jews in the New Year is for increased tolerance and understanding.

Irving Howe was a Renaissance man

Irving Howe was one of the most important literary critics, Yiddishists, democratic socialists and intellectuals of his generation. Twelve years after his death, at the age of 73, he is best remembered for his acclaimed book, World of Our Fathers (1976), a richly textured account of the eastern European Jewish experience in New York City. A Renaissance man, Howe was also an academic, the editor of the quarterly journal Dissent, the author of a slew of books on major novelists and political figures ranging from William Faulkner to Leon Trotsky, an essayist whose works included "The Age of Conformity" and "The New York Intellectuals," the editor or co-editor of anthologies on Yiddish literature and a regular contributor to such serious magazines as Partisan Review and Harper's.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The scion of David Horenstein and Nettie Goldman, who arrived in the United States from Bukovina in 1912, he was born in a working-class neighbourhood in the Bronx where Yiddish was the language of the home, streets and shops. And so, as Gerald Sorin observes in his definitive biography, Irving Howe: A Life of Passionate Dissent (New York University Press), he was one of the few U.S. intellectuals who was fluent in Yiddish.

A voracious reader, Howe compared the grinding poverty of his youth to that of Nathaniel Hawthorne and Herman Melville. Referring to his parents' traumatic loss of their grocery store during the Depression, he said, "I, too, had experienced 'the trauma of sharply fallen circumstances.'"

For Howe and Yiddish-speaking immigrant Jews like his parents, socialism was not merely a grand idea, but "a way of life" and a secular version of the Judaic prophetic tradition whose conceptual framework gave meaning to the sense of chaos and disintegration roiling the 1930s.

Like many Jewish boys of his era, Howe attended the tuition-free City College of New York, 80 per cent of whose students were Jewish. In his freshman year in 1936, Howe, an anti-Zionist, gravitated toward Trotskyism, but in 1940, he broke with the Trotskyists over the nature of the Soviet Union. He was convinced it was neither a democratic nor a workers' state.

When he was young, Howe downplayed his Jewishness, claiming his worldview transcended "national identity." Such was his mindset that when he reviewed a book about the German concentration camps in 1947, he did so without ever mentioning the Jews! He would later regret his myopia, saying that socialists like himself had stupidly and indefensibly ignored the Holocaust.

After the war, Howe grew increasingly concerned with Jewish themes, being cognizant that only an accident of geography and the vagaries of immigration separated him and his Jewish friends from the Jews who had been murdered by the Nazis. But he continued to embrace what he described as "universal values."

Howe's cosmopolitanism could be personally troubling. Anti-Semitic passages in the poetry of T. S. Eliot and Ezra Pound caused him great pain. For a while, Howe suffered in silence. But in a piece in Commentary in 1949, he attacked American novelists – icons such as Thomas Wolfe, Henry James and Edith Wharton – who appeared to perpetuate classic anti-Semitic stereotypes.

Throughout much of the 1940s, Howe harped on the themes that the United States and the Soviet Union were equally imperialist powers and that World War II had been a battle "for the retention of the reactionary status quo."

But with the intensification of the Cold War, Howe had a change of heart, reaching the conclusion that the West's struggle against Stalinist expansionism was really about the future of democracy. In his heart of hearts, he knew that "the inadequate democracy" of capitalism was preferable to a system that denied political freedom. As he put it, "Totalitarianism is a social evil distinct from any we have known." Although Howe was no longer an orthodox Marxist, he remained a radical critic of U.S. society.

When he was honourably discharged from the army, where he had expanded his knowledge through a rigorous regime of reading, Howe earned a living by writing copy for book jackets, fine-tuning translations and producing synopses of novels for Paramount Studios.

In 1948, he accepted a part-time job as a book reviewer for Time, the weekly he had held in contempt. But the pay was so good that he stayed on until 1953, when Brandeis University hired him as a lecturer in English literature. In subsequent years, Howe taught at Stanford University and his alma mater, City University. By all accounts, he was an excellent teacher. His students included Martin Peretz, the present owner of the New Republic, and Michael Walzer, who would become a leading political philosopher.

Convinced that liberal anti-Communist publications like Partisan Review and Commentary were insensitive to the dangers of McCarthyism, Howe and a few friends founded Dissent in 1954. Its mandate was two-fold: to promote socialist tenets and to try to reverse the decline of the socialist movement in the United States.

Howe ran Dissent as a one-man show, and although it had a respectable circulation and enjoyed the support of the labour movement, particularly the United Auto Workers, it was a money-losing operation perpetually dependent on fundraising drives.

From 1966 until 1987, Howe and his constant collaborator, Eliezer Greenberg, churned out a series of anthologies of Yiddish literature (A Treasury of Yiddish Stories and A Treasury of Yiddish Poetry, to name but two).

In a transforming moment during that period, Greenberg read Howe a story by a fairly obscure Yiddish novelist named Isaac Bashevis Singer. Bowled over by Gimpel the Fool, Howe knew he was in the presence of a major "new" writer. (Readers of the Forward, of course, had discovered Singer long before Howe was mesmerized by his prose). Wishing to share his discovery with his Brandeis students, Howe created a course on Yiddish literature, one of the first in American academia.

Irving Howe

By then, Howe had begun publishing literary and political essays for the finest magazines in the country. His pieces on Ernest Hemingway and Saul Bellow, among others, established him as an incisive critic.

When a New Left student leader named Cohen asked by what right he called himself a radical, Howe responded dismissively, "Cohen, you know what you're going to end up as – a dentist! And I'll be a radical after you start pulling teeth."

Howe described The World of Our Fathers, his landmark work, as "a farewell with love and gratitude" to Yiddish and Yiddishkeit and " an attempt to find enduring meaning in the collective experience of the Jewish working class." Yet, as he noted, his magnum opus was hardly an exercise in nostalgia.

Whatever it was or was not, The World of Our Fathers made Howe a wealthy man, enabling him to buy a beautiful apartment near the Metropolitan Museum of Art and to send his children to graduate school. One of his offspring, Nina, teaches psychology at Concordia University in Montreal.

Soren, a professor of Jewish studies at State University of New York, says that Howe was electrified by Israel's victory in the 1967 Six Day War. Writing in Dissent, Howe declared that Israel's preservation was "an urgent moral and political necessity."

Under the influence of Marie Syrkin, one of his Brandeis colleagues, Howe had moved from support of a binational workers' state in Palestine (the Trotskyist position) to a two-state solution.

Howe, however, was none too pleased by the influence Orthodox Jews exerted on Israeli civil law, and he was critical of Israel's occupation of the territories and its policy of building settlements there.

Returning from a trip to Israel in 1978, just months after the Egyptian president, Anwar Sadat, had flown to Jerusalem, he signed a Peace Now petition calling on Israel to show greater flexibility in negotiations with Egypt and greater sensitivity to the plight of the Palestinians.

Howe spent his last two years, from 1991 to 1993, fully engaged as a writer, editor and political activist. His health deteriorated after three successive operations, but he managed to finish two impressive books, Politics and the Novel and A Critic's Notebook.

He died on May 5, 1993, of a burst abdominal aneurysm.

"In the literary and political world at large," Soren writes in a justly glowing tribute, "many feel the loss of his integrity, his luminous intelligence, his radical imagination, his abiding menshlikhayt, his skillful editorial diplomacy and his consistently critical but supportive spurs to productivity and creativity."

The journeys of David Toback

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

It is sometimes said that heredity is destiny. For David Toback, who had his bar mitvah in a dirt-poor Ukrainian village in 1888, the pair of tfillin that his father gave him that day would help shape his destiny. The tefillin were 132 years old and had belonged to his great-grandfather, who was revered as a tzaddik.

At home after the synagogue service, David's mother weeps because she has no means to make a party. But that evening, friends and relatives arrive with pots of potatoes and cabbage, roasted lamb and loaves of bread. As they are about to make the blessing, the sound of horses' hooves announces the arrival of a large coach pulled by four black horses.

Several Chassidim emerge in long black kaftans, fur hats, thick beards and curled payes, including two famous rabbis and an elderly rav of even more awesome reputation. They have come to honour the great-grandfather of the boy who would be putting on his tfillin for the first time.

The villagers tremble to be near such scholars, but the kindly Chassidim are friendly with everyone, their faces shining as they discourse on Torah. The rav, having heard that David had been studying Mishnah, says he would like to examine him. David steps forward, his face burning, his heart thumping; the rav whispers to him not to be afraid.

"The moment he touched me I felt a little calmer. I noticed my mother staring at me and suddenly I felt confident that I could answer anything he asked – and that was how it happened. For each question, a response would leap into my head and begin to develop, first one way, then another. All the ideas I thought of were new to me. I could hardly believe how quiet everyone was and how they stared at me, and I sensed it was with great respect. This was particularly so when the rav stood up, came over to me, and kissed me on the forehead.

"My mother's joy was extreme. She was unable to contain herself and flung herself on me and began to weep… The rav addressed her and my father in a solemn tone. 'Your child is not an ordinary person. Not only is he intelligent, but he has a pure heart. You must see to it that he studies with good teachers, even if you send him away from you.'"

This moving encounter is one of many excellent scenes in The Journeys of David Toback, first published by Schocken in 1981 and again by Walker & Co. in 1992. In his old age, Toback, then a retired butcher in New York, wrote his life's story, certain it would never be read. His granddaughter, Carole Malkin, edited and polished the manuscript into a charming and riveting narrative that captures the gritty texture of Jewish life in the Russian Pale in the 1890s.

As the rav predicted, David is sent to a yeshiva, but by degrees he loses his purity, gaining worldly experience through many intriguing adventures. At 15, his parents want him to come home and marry a poor village girl, but he escapes from both home and yeshiva. His journeys take him to through many small villages as well as the cities of Kremenets, Proskurov, Kishinev and Cotu Mori. The book ends with his passage to America, an extraordinary episode in itself.

Like many Jewish memoirs, this one was written after a tragedy: Toback's daughter, Tzerl, had jumped from a roof and killed herself. A year later, he filled five notebooks with Yiddish prose, certain all the while that no one would care about an old man and his memories. "I'm going to put it all in the closet, and when I die it goes into the garbage," he wrote. But fortunately, as with many of his adventures, a surprise ending lay in store, preserving his tale for posterity.

Immigrant's first job in Toronto without pay

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

Not everyone came with the family or had anyone waiting for them to ease their absorption. The following is one such story.

Disembarking at Halifax, Morris boarded the train bound for Toronto. Upon arriving in Union Station, he had but a single suitcase and a crumbled piece of paper, the words "Paramount Hotel" written on it.

Morris went out the train-station doors toward the taxis. It was the middle of January and the temperature was some minus 15. He couldn't comprehend that cold could be so, that his breath would actually fog in front of him. Startled, he ran back into the warmth of the station and looked at this cold new world through its glass doors.

Now, mustering all of his courage, he took a deep breath and ran coatless into one of the awaiting taxis. He handed the driver his little note. The driver pulled out with a mysterious chuckle.

Notwithstanding its grand name, this was more of a boarding house than it was a hotel, and loud music was pounding the thin walls of his room.

Morris decided to walk about and returned after midnight in the hope that the music would end. By 4 a.m., the sleepless Morris could take no more of the incessant beat. He wandered into the deserted night streets. At 5 a.m., he saw a storefront lit up, but more important, like a beacon, there was a Star of a David on the window. It was the original Switzer's Deli.

He knocked on the door and a man soon came out to tell him that they were closed. Unable to understand a word of English, Morris addressed the man in French. Luckily, this caretaker was a French-Canadian who took pity on Morris. He let him in to warm up and even made a pot of coffee for him. In the morning, lodging in a rooming house on Borden Street was found for six dollars a week.

Returning to the only place he knew, Switzer's Deli, Morris met another young man, Hyman Beckstien, an ex-Montrealer. The two struck up a friendship that continues until this day.

Morris had all of $5 in his pocket and no prospect of a job. He was offered work for several weeks with no pay. True to his word, his employer let Morris work without so much as offering him a snack.

For a nickel, one could buy half a loaf of bread. A cup of coffee was also a nickel and, for another nickel, a bar of chocolate could be had. In this way, Morris fed himself; coffee with a chocolate bar between two slices of bread. He would return to his room every night past midnight in order to avoid his landlady as he had no way of paying the next week's rent.

Morris' diet soon became the source of ridicule for the people he worked with. When his "boss" realized Morris' situation, he called the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society (JIAS). "How could you bring these men over here and abandon them this way?" he asked.

Morris was told to go to the JIAS, where he was given a cheque for $75. At the time, this seemed to him like $75 million.

Soon he found a job at City Parking Ltd. washing cars. From washing cars, he went on to fix them and then on to become the station manager. Many young Moroccan immigrant men found their first employment in those years through Morris in City Park Ltd.

Today, Morris Dadoun is a successful insurance executive in Toronto, where he is active in the community and in several synagogues.

The Time of the Uprooted* by Elie Wiesel, Random House Canada.

Wiesel's latest perhaps his most personal

Books
Bernard Baskin

Elie Wiesel's arm bears the concentration camp number A7713. At 77, he sees himself not as an essayist or novelist in the accepted contemporary vein, but as a vehicle, a conduit, a messenger.

But this was not always the case. When he was liberated from Buchenwald as a young man, he vowed that he would not speak or write of his experiences for at least 10 years. Working in Paris as a journalist for an Israeli newspaper, Wiesel interviewed the author François Mauriac, a devout Christian and Nobel Prize winner.

Mauriac spoke about Jesus and Wiesel said to him, "Ten years ago, I knew hundreds of Jewish children who suffered more than Jesus did and no one talks about it." Mauriac wept and said, "You should talk about it." That moved Wiesel more than anything else and opened an eloquent channel of communication about the once incommunicable.

Yet, speaking of the 40 books he has written, Wiesel confesses that, in his opinion, every one has been a failure. He feels a sense of inadequacy but has a compulsion to write. He says he owes it to the dead as well as to the living.

Wiesel, one of the treasured icons of our age, is active in many spheres. Astonishingly creative, he is at one and the same time a celebrated novelist, international diplomat, advocate in defence of the oppressed, memoirist and public intellectual. A recipient of the Nobel Prize, he remains, despite his notoriety, a somewhat enigmatic figure, influenced by the power of mysticism and the truth that is sometimes embedded in madness.

The protagonist of The Time of the Uprooted, Gamaliel Friedman, is orphaned when his parents become victims of Nazi horror. He owes his survival to Ilonka, a Christian nightclub singer who pretends that the young boy left in her care is her nephew.

Gamaliel makes his way to Vienna, Paris and then the United States, unable to persuade Ilonka to come with him. He becomes part of a small group of Holocaust survivors who mockingly refer to themselves as "The Elders of Zion." Haunted by unspeakable memories, they are, for the most part, cynical and distrustful of both God and man. Yet, at the same time, they are quick-witted, resourceful and eager to discuss and attempt to unravel a web of intricate theological questions.

Gamaliel reacts negatively to the widespread use of the term "Holocaust survivor" – it has been cheapened, made a cliché, used in all kinds of situations. "Everybody wanted to be one. No need to have undergone a selection at Birkenau or the tortures of Treblinka… How many times Gamaliel had heard some hapless speaker trying to win the audience's sympathy by declaiming, 'We are all survivors… Of course, I was born in Manhattan, but I could have been born in Lodz or Krakow…' Didn't they realize that if everyone is a potential or virtual survivor, then no one is a true survivor?"

Gamaliel earns his living as a ghostwriter, able to bring to life and put into words the experience of others, but he is unable to do the same for himself. A tragic figure, his plight is made even more pitiable by the failure of his marriage and the desertion of his children.

Rich in plot and the limning of memorable characters, replete with spirited discussions on perplexing questions, including the meaning of suffering and compassion, The Time of the Uprooted, perhaps the most personal of the author's novels, is a deeply affecting and moving work.

Sukkot in seven steps

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"In Sukkot you shall dwell, seven days… That your generations may know that in booths I made the children of Israel dwell when I brought them out of the land of Egypt." Leviticus 23:42. [http://tinyurl.com/8kmkg] With that, we are commanded to perform one of the most joyous mitzvot in the Jewish calendar. Today, Sukkot in seven steps from the World Wide Web.

1. LEARN ABOUT IT: Whether you decide to start from scratch or want to buy a prefab sukkah, take a look at Ten Tips for Your Sukkah, and while you're there check out the article explaining the hows and whys of building a sukkah. [http://tinyurl.com/cmlyu] Need more detail? The Mishnah explains that a sukkah built on top of a wagon or on the deck of a ship may be used on the holiday. A sukkah built on a treetop or the back of a camel is valid but may not be used on the festival. [http://tinyurl.com/7aqte] Impossible you say? Then you haven't been to Israel's Neot Kedumim Biblical Reserve, where each year they consruct the unusual sukkahs described in the Mishnah. [http://tinyurl.com/cxd2r]

2. BUILD IT: If camels aren't a concern and if you like the smell of sawdust, look at Steven Ross Weintraub's Sukkah Building Instructions. [http://tinyurl.com/7jfb2] Nice. But in my part of the world, a lattice sukkah won't stop the cold October winds. Gary Garb's model seems a bit sturdier, and you have to hand it to anyone who creates a 15-page online sukkah construction manual. [http://succah.telarian.com/]

For anyone who is thinking of taking the easy way out and buying a prefab sukkah, read up on the trials and tribulations of Ellis Shuman. [http:// tinyurl .com/ bulcc].

3. DECORATE IT: Once your sukkah is up, it's time to make it even more beautiful. Not only can you e-mail friends some lovely Sukkot greeting cards but you can also print them out to decorate your sukkah. [http://greetz.com/sukkot/] You'll find more holiday craft ideas at the Jewish Theological Seminary's Kids' Corner. [http://tinyurl.com/9q6xd]

If you are looking for some international inspiration, check out the gallery of sukkahs from Jerusalem to Spain to Hawaii. [http://tinyurl.com/7dp9x] And if you want to see when a sukkah turns into an object of art, take a look at the beautiful models from Iran, Holland, Kurdistan and elsewhere exhibited at Jerusalem's Israel Museum. [http://tinyurl.com/9zt9l]

4. ENTERTAIN IN IT: If you build it they will come. Who? In addition to your earthly guests, tradition holds that every sukkah is graced each night by a different tzaddik: Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Aaron and King David. The Orthodox Union has a good page explaining the spiritual significance of Ushpizin. [www.ou.org/chagim/sukkot/ushpizin.htm]

5. EAT IN IT: The Jewish-food Sukkoth index has several suggestions for keeping warm while dining out(side). You'll find recipes for Braised Moroccan Lamb with Prunes, Almonds and Apricots, Stuffed Tiberias Peppers, Hearts of Lulav (Palm) Salad and Pomerantzen (candied oranges eaten traditionally during Sukkot.) [http://tinyurl.com/dvdzb] Hungry for more? Look at the rec.food.cuisine.jewish newsgroup archives. [http://tinyurl .com/6ms5n]

6. EAT IT: These sukkahs have roofs of pretzels supported by walls of graham crackers. Did the Israelites decorate the walls of their sukkahs with fruit-flavoured Trix cereal, too? [http://tinyurl.com /do9fp]

7. LEARN FROM IT: In When a House is Not Your Home, Rabbi Mendel Weinbach suggests that no matter how beautifully we decorate a sukkah, there's no mistaking that it's a temporary structure. From that we can learn about the transience of life. [www.ohr.org.il/special/sukkos/]

Rabbi Weinbach tells the story of a traveller who once visited the Chafetz Chaim. "Where is your furniture?" asked the astonished visitor of the sage when he saw how barely furnished the room was. "And where is yours?" was the Chafetz Chaim's response. "I have no furniture with me because I am only passing through," explained the visitor. "I, too, am only passing through this world," said the Chafetz Chaim, "for our lives here are only a preparation for the real world, the World to Come. For merely passing through this corridor of time I have enough furniture."

Have a very happy holiday!

'Twinning program' participants honoured

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto celebrated its first annual "Twinning Program" dinner last week to honour the students and survivors who helped further Holocaust education.

The Twinning Program is a course that enables youth who are celebrating their bar and bat mitzvahs to share their special day with a young Holocaust victim who never had a chance to reach this milestone.

Each participant selects a child with whom to twin – ideally, a relative or friend of the family. After listening to a general lecture about the Holocaust at the centre, each child does extensive research about his or her twin and writes a summary about the twin's history, background, town and fate.

"The goal is to remember and honour the millions of children lost, giving them names, remembering their lives, places of residence and background and perpetrating their memory," said Eleanor Getzler, the chair of the Twinning Program and a child of Holocaust survivors.

"Through remembrance we educate. With education, we gain empowerment and change, and that, hopefully, will be the outcome of the Twinning Program."

The program, which has only been in operation in Toronto since 2003, was established due to the efforts of Howard Nightingale.

When Nightingale's son, Joshua, was approaching his 12th birthday, he began to think about a way to forge a deep connection between his son and the memory of the Holocaust.

"I knew that his would be the last generation to know a survivor and I wanted to ensure that his connection to the Holocaust was through more than my parents," Nightingale told the audience gathered at the Lipa Green Building.

After doing some research, he learned of a twinning program in Montreal and he twinned his son with a child of the Holocaust who did not survive.

Since then, almost 50 youth have followed suit and Nightingale hopes the number will continue to increase.

From left, Mary Siklos, the Twinning Program co-ordinator, assists Gerda Frieberg and Sarah Bogach with the lighting of the first candle during the candlelighting ceremony to commemorate the six million Jewish victims of the Holocaust.

Jackie Masters, a young participant who celebrated her bat mitzvah last June, said that while it was an emotional experience for her, it is one she is proud of.

> 'We will never be able to undo the damage of the Holocaust, but by keeping the memory alive, of even one individual, we deny all the anti-Semites a victory'

"We will never be able to undo the damage of the Holocaust, but by keeping the memory alive, of even one individual, we deny all the anti-Semites a victory," she said.

"The Twinning Program made me want to learn more about the Holocaust and what the Jewish people went through. I want to stay in the Twinning Program and learn more so I can teach the ones who have not been taught."

Judy Weissenberg Cohen, who survived Aushwitz-Birkenau, Bergen-Belsen, slave labour in an airplane factory and a death march before she was liberated at 16, saluted the young people on behalf of all the victims and survivors of the Holocaust.

But she warned the gathering to continue to fight genocide in all its forms, referring to the atrocities in Darfur and Rwanda.

"I always hope that the young and the not so young, who listen to my words will not cry, but rather will start thinking about the issues we are facing today in the light of the dreadful past and be courageous enough to stand up and be counted should the need arise."

HU profs share wisdom with Torontonians

By TANIA HAAS
Special to the CJN

Israel's recent pull-out from Gaza signals a new era in Israel policy, said visiting Israeli academic Ya'acov Bar-Siman Tov to 275 people who attended a seminar at Beth Tzedec synagogue recently.

"There is no other way to get away from terror but to disengage from it, which was very hard for [Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon, the godfather of the settlements. He had to admit that he didn't solve the conflict, but he also ushered in new Israeli priorities."

Bar-Siman Tov is the director of the Swiss Center for Conflict Resolution at the Hebrew University and a lecturer with the "Best of Hebrew You!" seminar series presented by the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University.

Attendees heard insights from several academics about the impact of the security fence, the Israeli political system and the university's leadership in research technology. The Canadian Friends of Hebrew University seminar series made stops in Vancouver and Ottawa before Toronto.

Longtime Hebrew University supporter Elaine Cooper was more than pleased with the sessions.

"Hebrew University understands the principles of quality adult education. You get the very best bang for your buck." said Cooper.

Cooper also attended a Hebrew University-led study mission last October. "We didn't shlep around. It was an amazing opportunity to learn from profound scholars."

"After Disengagement," with panellists Bar-Siman Tov and Noam Shoval and moderated by Toronto academic Janice Gross Stein, was the final lecture.

"The impetus for the disengagement came from within Israel. Close to 70 per cent of Israelis supported separation from the Palestinians," said Bar-Siman Tov to a packed room.

"But Palestinians are reluctant to believe that a plan led by Sharon can be good for them."

For 30 years, Sharon was the settlers' strongest advocate. Today, his role is harder to define.

Last week, Sharon narrowly beat out his opponent Benjamin Netanyahu in a vote held by the Likud party. The vote determined when the party primaries were to be held, but was widely viewed as a referendum on his leadership.

Sharon's role in Israel may be less than clear, but recently he has gained esteem among world leaders.

"The disengagement improved Israel's image on an international scale." said Shoval, who is a geographer.

"The Philedelphi Route security agreement has also demonstrated improved relations with Israel."

Egypt agreed to police the Philadelphi Route, the border area separating Egypt and the Gaza Strip, after the Israeli disengagement.

"But viable international assistance, like land swapping between Israel and its neighbours, could make the Palestinian state a more susceptible solution," Shoval said.

Land swapping was but one recommendation made for a two-state solution. Panellists' requirements for implementing a two-state solution included the maintenance of the ceasefire, the continued release of prisoners, a return to the 2003 "road map" peace plan, dismantling of Palestinian terrorist groups, and the removal of outposts, which Bar Siman-Tov referred to as "most humiliating."

The greatest challenge to a final agreement remains Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' ability to establish democratic institutions and dismantle Hamas and Jihad without a civil war among the Palestinians. Bar-Siman Tov also mentioned the significance of the upcoming Palestinian elections in January 2006 and the Likud primary vote next spring.

Bar-Siman Tov said, in response to a passionate audience member, that at least one year of non-violence is a conditional strategy that will minimize losses for both parties and increase confidence between the parties. "There needs to be a period of 'positive delay.'"

Attendees also heard a lecture on poverty in Israel given by Yuval Elbashan, founder of the Centre for Clinical Legal Education for Human Rights and Social Responsibility in the faculty of law at Hebrew University.

Stein commented that "people walked out of Yuval's session knowing that one in six Israelis live below the poverty line. Academics like Yuval shine the spotlight on places where we don't want to look."

As a leading expert in international conflict and conflict management, Stein made some of the seminar's most poignant observations on Israel's withdrawal from Gaza.

"The young people that I watched on television, had every reason to make the withdrawal costly and complicated. However… these young people used such self-discipline not to use violence against their own army. In the face of provocation, the army behaved with restraint. It is a difficult task to build deeply embedded democratic institutions that can withstand this kind of strength," she said.

S. African Jews were complicit in apartheid: prof

By OREN SHEFA
Special to the CJN

A night of celebration, reunion and song ended on an introspective and somewhat humbling note last week as Prof. Gideon Shimoni discussed some of the moral failures of the Jewish community in apartheid South Africa.

"We were participants of racial discrimination… We were part of the privileged few," Shimoni, a Hebrew University of Jerusalem history professor, recently told a reunion of the Zionist youth movement Habonim Dror, South Africa, at Bialik Hebrew Day School.

Shimoni's lecture was the highlight of the event, one of a number being held worldwide to celebrate Habonim Dror, South Africa's 75th year. The evening was one of rekindling old friendships and of forging new relations among Toronto's growing South African Jewish community.

The night ended with Shimoni's talk, titled "South African Jewry: Then and Now," which drew on his 2003 book Community and Conscience: The Jews in Apartheid South Africa.

Pointing to decisions made by religious leaders of the time not to stir up trouble, Shimoni said that while the South African Jewish community as a whole was clearly against the racist regime, for the most part, during the apartheid years between 1948 and 1994, Jews did and said little about the racist policies of a corrupt government.

Jewish leaders' policy of inaction was based on the backlash they thought they would have received from their own people for placing them in harm's way, said Shimoni, who holds Hebrew U's Shlomo Argov chair in Israel-Diaspora relations.

He suggested that since South African Jews are not considered to have been active participants in apartheid, "in hindsight, it seems that despite the moral failure of this policy, the community's decision not to act seems to have been vindicated."

But Shimoni said he believes that Jewish people – with a long history of facing prejudice from the rest of the world – should have provided the South African government with a better example, instead of hiding behind the fact they were marginal outsiders.

"It's hard to find a South African Jew that didn't resist apartheid or that didn't have to leave South Africa to escape imprisonment," Shimoni said with a hint of sarcasm. "The reality is that these claims are simply untrue."

While Shimoni did not go into detail about the current relationship between South Africa and Israel, he said there's no comparison between apartheid South Africa and the Israeli-Palestinian situation.

"But there are similarities between the religious nationalists on both sides that believe in a zero sum game – that it's either them or us," he said. "These parallels are too terrible to imagine, and we as South Africans should be even more sensitized to it."

Shimoni praised Habonim, which he belonged to in his youth in South Africa before making aliyah in 1961.

"The role of youth movements in national ideologies is of inestimable importance," he said.

Event organizer and former Habonim member Mark Skapinker said the evening was a huge success.

"We managed to reach over 200 people who re-established contact with each other," he said.

"So many of us were in Habonim Southern Africa during very turbulent times… Those relationships have endured, and even when we haven't seen each other for many years. It is wonderful how quickly they are rekindled."

Ballots or bullets: Hamas – and PA – must choose

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Hamas, according to some Western analysts, will become more moderate once it gains political responsibility by participating in the Palestinian Legislative Council elections scheduled for January. Others argue that Hamas must denounce its terrorist roots by disarming and rescinding its covenant, which calls for the destruction of Israel. Otherwise, there is no reason to assume that Hamas will use the democratic process for anything other than the pursuit of its violent agenda.

U.S. policy concerning Hamas' participation in the Palestinian elections was laid out by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice during a Sept. 30 speech at Princeton University. As quoted by Aluf Benn in Ha'aretz ("Rice: Hamas must disarm before entering politics," Oct. 2), Rice said: "Hamas is a terror organization and it has to be disbanded, both for the sake of peace and security in the Middle East and for the sake of the proper functioning of the Palestinian Authority. After all, under the "road map" [peace plan], the [PA] has undertaken to disband militias and armed resistance groups."

Rice's statement bolsters Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's previous declaration that Israel would do nothing to help the Palestinian elections until Hamas is disarmed and renounces its charter.

She was particularly firm: "I cannot imagine, in the final analysis, a new [Palestinian] national compact that leaves an armed resistance group within the political space. You cannot simultaneously keep an option open on politics and an option on violence. There simply isn't a case I can think of internationally where that's been permitted to happen."

Rice cited Northern Ireland, where the IRA is disarming while its political wing, Sinn Fein, participates in the political process. She also noted that in Afghanistan, no warlords were permitted to be candidates in elections.

She reminded her Princeton audience: "Hamas stands for a one-state solution [an Islamic state], not a two-state solution. Hamas, therefore, stands for the destruction of Israel. Hamas is an organization that asks Palestinian mothers and fathers to give their children up to make themselves suicide bombers. And it is a real detriment and block to further peace in the Middle East."

British, German, and Canadian government officials have also recently declared that conditions must be attached to Hamas' participation in the upcoming elections. There is a price not only for the participation in the democratic process, but also for the genuine endorsement of it.

On a related matter: While it's common knowledge that plenty of money flows from Saudi Arabia to Hamas, recent reports indicate that Hamas is operating a command centre in Saudi Arabia.

Matthew Levitt reported in the Washington Institute of Near East Policy's PeaceWatch ("A Hamas Headquarters in Saudi Arabia?" Sept. 28) that Saudi money has been traced to Hamas' development of the Qassam rockets launched into Israel, particularly Sderot.

Levitt, director of terrorism studies at the institute, wrote: "What is most disturbing is that such activity persists despite repeated Saudi pledges to curb terror financing and the promotion of Islamist extremism from within the Kingdom."

He said that following Al Qaeda attacks on Saudi Arabia, some Saudi efforts to restrict charities supporting Al Qaeda and Hamas have had only limited effectiveness. Several government-supported funds continue to channel money to Hamas.

Levitt noted that in August, "Saudi television ran a program on the jihad in Palestine that implored viewers to donate funds to the Palestinian intifadah [while] a speaker instructed viewers [that] 'Jihad is the pinnacle of Islam.'"

Journalists who are concerned about understanding Hamas need to look critically at the sources of Hamas funding, including Saudi Arabia's primary role.

Federal Court injunction bars supremacist messages from Web

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In Richard Warman's one-man battle against Canadian white supremacists, last week's decision by a Federal Court judge marks yet another victory – one he believes set an important precedent for future cases.

Last week, Judge Yves de Montigny ordered Tomasz Winnicki of London to refrain "from communicating, by means of the Internet, messages that are likely to expose persons to hatred or contempt" because of their religious, racial or national background.

The interlocutory (interim) injunction is precedent-setting, Warman, an Ottawa lawyer, said, because "for the first time a Federal Court has issued an injunction relating to Internet hate." Previous interim court rulings dealt with hate messages distributed through the telephone system, he said.

Judge makes precedent-setting ruling

Although the court had not released the reasons for its ruling when The CJN went to press, Warman said the decision shows courts can restrain objectionable content from the Internet pending disposition of the case before a human rights tribunal.

Warman launched a complaint two years ago alleging that Winnicki breached the Canadian Human Rights Act by using the Internet to communicate hate messages. He initiated the complaint based on material Winnicki allegedly posted on his personal website and on material carried by a U.S. white supremacist website.

Warman alleges that Winnicki posted messages that attacked Jews and other groups. One message warned "we are coming for you, you Jew f...s, you and your servile dogs too."

Warman also alleges that some of the messages attacked him personally by posting his picture, suggesting he is a Jew (he is not) and an enemy.

Although the case has been before a human rights tribunal for months, Winnicki has continued to post other hate messages, Warman alleged.

The interlocutory injunction will prevent Winnicki from doing so pending a resolution of the case, he added.

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region, said the court has pre-empted Winnicki from posting problematic Internet content. "I think the decision of the Federal Court is an important statement on the position that Canadian laws take on the question of alleged hatemongers," he said.

The Winnicki case, which will reconvene on Oct. 17 in Toronto, is one of 12 Warman has launched in the last 2½ years that involve leaders of extremist groups. All relate to the Internet.

Warman, who worked for the Canadian Human Rights Commission for two years, said he is targeting extremist leaders in a strategic and concerted manner. If we go after a small number of leaders, the white supremacist movement can be eradicated, he said.

"I'm doing this due to fundamental human rights, I guess. It would make it difficult for me to sleep at night knowing someone is calling for the expulsion of my neighbours because they are Jewish or black," he said.

New program taps future leaders

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Dovi Klein has his eyes set on the future leaders of the Jewish community.

As the National Conference of Synagogue Youth's (NCSY) new director of leadership development, Klein's mandate is to seek out youth who have the drive to become communal leaders.

Rabbi Glenn Black, regional director of NCSY, said the organization recently established Klein's position because it's been watching trends in the community and discovered that fewer and fewer people are willing to take on leadership roles.

Dovi Klein

"[In many organizations], the same chair[s] are holding down the same positions, and there is no one new moving up.

"[The problem as I see it] is that not enough people are being inspired at a critical time in their lives to see themselves as leaders."

What NCSY has done, he said, "is identify [some of] the best and the brightest [teens] and put them on a different agenda."

About 50 of these teens came together recently to launch a new initiative, said Klein, 25, at a "leadership launch" held at Congregation Anshei Minsk in Kensington Market.

"The teens [all invited by NCSY] took part in a weekend full of programs, which were all designed to enhance certain leadership skills, such as public speaking or decision making or solving community crises such as assimilation or intermarriage."

NCSY held the weekend at the downtown synagogue, Rabbi Black said, because it's one of the city's oldest shuls and organizers wanted to take the teens back to the past.

"One person broke ground [to build the synagogue], which still stands as a beacon of light downtown. We wanted the teens – many of whom go to public school and come from unaffiliated homes – to see that one person with an idea can make a difference," he said

Many of the youth were identified through Jewish culture clubs currently running in about 10 GTA schools, said Klein, who until now has been working at NCSY doing outreach and teaching at its Torah High.

"These culture clubs – they run in partnership with the school and NCSY, which sends an adviser – are important for kids in public school because [the clubs] become an oasis of Jewish life in a sea of multicultural clubs," Klein said.

"In some clubs, about 60 kids attend every week. This is where we identify many potential leaders."

For information on NCSY's leadership initiative, call Klein at 905-761-6279, ext. 29.

Al Gilbert is a master of portraiture who has captured history through the lens of a camera for more than 60 years.

BY DAVID BLUMENFELD

Commenting on Mr. Gilbert's appointment to the Order of Canada, the famous American photographer John Howell said, "He is, in every sense of the word, a-true ambassador of Canada, eminently qualified and deserving of the highest distinction for service that can be conferred."

He has taken more than 20,000 files of photographic images in his career as an awarding-winning photographer – Golda Meir, Bora Laskin, Pope John Paul II and Lester Pearson are but a few of the well-known personalities he has in his portfolio. The list, he maintains, is too long to try and pick favourites.

"If I had to choose one, it would be (David) Ben-Gurion," says Mr. Gilbert, who was awarded membership to the Order of Canada in 1990.

"He was the first Israeli Prime Minister that I photographed. It's one of my favourites because of how important he was to Jewry around the world, and his flock of white hair."

Over the years, Mr. Gilbert has photographed all but two of Israel's prime ministers. He missed Moshe Sharett, who served briefly from 1954 to 1955, and is still waiting to snap current Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

"I have to photograph him. I think he's made a mark in history," Mr. Gilbert said.

Describing his style as "classical portraiture" with a flare of journalism, Mr. Gilbert continues in his tradition of excellence by photographing people from all walks of life. And through the formation of Al Gilbert and Associates Inc., located at 170 Davenport Rd. in Toronto, he continues the four-generation legacy established by his father Nathan.

By surrounding himself with fresh young talent, including his son Michael and grandson Darren, along with other seasoned photographers such as former Toronto Star photographer Boris Spremo – one of the top photojournalists in the world – Mr. Gilbert now offers website and slideshow design, sound production and communication services, along with award-winning photography, to corporate clients and families.

Following in the footsteps of his father, Nathan, who opened a studio in 1922 on Toronto's Queen Street West, Mr. Gilbert says he has embraced the era of digital photography having seen the business grow from the days when pictures were made using glass plates and window light.

"I'm inspired by what has happened to photography, and I'm inspired now to produce signature portraits that will be classical and marry the individual to their background," says Mr. Gilbert.

A master of light, reflection, tone and facial analysis, Mr. Gilbert creates his pictures with feeling and instinct, but also with a few other rules he says he has learned along the way.

"I've always believed that my camera should be on a tripod and that I should look at you... and that I can paint with light," he said. "I can put the lights where I want them, I can analyze the face and I can say: I'm positive I can get a great image here.

"That's what I would say is part of my success – being able to analyze the face and getting the best of it. You've got to try and bring out some emotion that shows in the image, and I can feel whether I have contact with you," he added.

Mr. Gilbert's ability to photograph and pose subjects perfectly – from CEOs of major corporations to children – has earned him numerous fellowships and honours around the world. He has been voted Photographer of the Year by the Professional Photographers of Canada three times, given a Lifetime Achievement Award by the Photographic Industry of America, and an International Award from the American Society of Photographers.

In 2003, he was also the first recipient of the Yousuf Karsh Memorial award from the Professional Photographers of Canada. In September, he was honoured by the City of Toronto for documenting in film and pictures the construction of the modern day City Hall precisely 40 years ago.

Additionally, Mr. Gilbert holds multiple degrees in photography and is the author of a number of books and videos on the subject. He has become a popular guest speaker and lecturer on his profession at home and overseas, and is a longtime supporter of Toronto's Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, to which he has contributed more than 100 historical photographs for Posluns Hall.

"That's there for all time... and so it's history. I have recorded a generation of Jewry, from my father in 1922 to today," Mr. Gilbert said. "I think people today, they should be recorded. Classical portraiture is something that's gone by the wayside. I keep it alive because if it was good enough for the artists of the past, like Rembrandt and the rest of them... then I know it's the only way."

> "I love to work with people on happy occasions. Isn't it amazing that even after all these years, I look forward to going to work?"

For Leah Rabin, the widow of the late Yitzhak Rabin, Mr. Gilbert's portrait of her husband has become one that stood out among the many taken of the former Israeli prime minister.

Speaking at a Toronto fundraiser, Mr. Gilbert said she was moved by the image he captured: "She was on the microphone to 5,000 people and said, 'When I look at that portrait by Gilbert, it's like he is still living.'"

Having been on forefront of photography now for more than six decades, Mr. Gilbert continues a lifetime of innovation with the creation of Al Gilbert and Associates Inc.

By surrounding himself with an exceptional team, including his wife Gail, Mr. Gilbert has only enhanced his in-depth knowledge and awareness of his field. His primary duty through the company, however, will remain taking the finest of images, whether it is a bride on her wedding day or a meeting among two politicians of global importance.

"I could have quit 10 years ago, but I do it because I love what I'm doing," he said. "I love to work with people on happy occasions. Isn't it amazing that even after all these years, I look forward to going to work?"

Students collect books for Israeli schools

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Linda Kirshblum, a teacher at Adath Israel Congregational School, was in Israel in February for a Jewish educators' conference when she visited a booth with information about a project called Books for Israel.

When she learned that English books were sorely needed in Israeli schools, she began to think about organizing a book drive at her school, which has about 170 students, including high schoolers, and also through Adath Israel Congregation, where her husband is the cantor.

"A lot of schools [in Israel] don't have English language libraries, and the kids are at a great disadvantage, because they're trying to learn English and they don't have the materials," Kirshblum told The CJN.

The grassroots effort, which began in 2002, has gathered more than 41 tons of books in the United States and England, and delivered them to more than 180 schools.

The project was recently renamed the Jade Bar Shalom Books for Israel project to honour the English teacher in Israel who co-founded the project with her sister, Rena Cohen, who lives in the United States. Bar Shalom was diagnosed with brain cancer in August.

Adath Israel's effort is the first such book drive in Canada, Kirshblum said. Like some of the other efforts, which can be viewed online at www.booksforisrael.org, it was dubbed "A Book and a Buck," because money is needed in addition to books, in order to offset shipping costs.

At the end of a two-week drive that ran from Sept. 18 to 30, the school had amassed more than two dozen boxes of books, including donations from Indigo Books and Associated Hebrew Schools, Kirshblum said.

After the start of the second intifadah in September 2000, a significant amount of Israeli government funding was diverted from education to security, she said. The schools affected, which are receiving English-language book donations, include Bedouin, Druze, Muslim, Bahai, Christian and Jewish public schools.

Volunteers were scheduled to sort through the books Oct. 10, weeding out those that were not in good condition or otherwise not appropriate for the project, and inserting donation stickers in the rest before packing them.

Kirshblum, who teaches Grade 2, said her class brought in "wonderful books," including the Berenstain Bears series and some Harry Potter books.

Adath Israel has been matched with a religious girls' school in Haifa. The students, however, represent a variety of backgrounds including Russian and Ethiopian immigrants. Some don't understand any English at all, while others have lived in English-speaking countries.

Although the school serves grades 7 to 12, it's part of a cluster of schools and is accepting books for younger children on behalf of elementary schools in the area.

RUBINGER, Bruno - Our family is saddened to announce the premature loss of our husband, father, son and brother, on September 28, 2005, at age 53, after a long and courageous battle with cancer. Bruno was a generous and kind man, with tremendous strength, vision and leadership. He was an inspiration to all of us for his devotion to do good, altruistic pursuit, considerate and positive demeanor. He raised a wonderful family. He was deeply involved in the Jewish community in Toronto, where his work made a significant difference. He was an expert in the field of Robotics, a matter of pride to him. Above all Bruno was a mensch. He was well respected and loved alike by family members, friends, co-workers, and members of his congregation, B'nai Torah. Bruno is survived by his dear wife and partner of 31 years, Gabriela, by his two sons, Daniel and Michael, by his parents Gina and Herman Rubinger, by his sister Carla Ulpian, by his twin brother, Morel, by his brother-in-law, Andrew Ulpian and sister-in-law, Lenore Rubinger. At his funeral there was an outpouring expression of the enormous respect and love Bruno elicited in his family, friends, co-workers, his synagogue community, B'nai Torah and in his Rabbi, Rabbi Marcus. He will be sadly missed, but never forgotten. The family wishes to thank all the doctors and nurses at PMH, as well as Dr. Orr at the Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem for the care they provided to Bruno. If desired, donations in Bruno's memory can be made to the B'nai Torah - Bruno Rubinger Memorial Fund.

Holiday Food Ideas

Jewish Festival Cooking – an essential resource for holidays

By NORENE GILLETZ

Have you ever wondered why we eat certain foods on each Jewish holiday?

Phyllis and Miriyam Glazer's The Essential Book of Jewish Festival Cooking (HarperCollins) has the answers. Their wonderful cookbook, packed with extraordinary recipes, will help you gain a rich understanding of the Jewish calendar year, its link to the signs of nature and the produce of the earth in each season.

This valuable resource for the Jewish festivals is organized by season, covering the major holidays and feast days of the Jewish year. The Essential Book of Jewish Festival Cooking contains more than 200 tempting recipes that capture the flavours of seasonal foods enjoyed by our ancestors. There are also menus and tips, including the origins, traditions, seasonal and biblical significance of each holiday and its special foods.

The guideline in planning a Sukkot menu is convenience – dishes that can be easily transported from the home to the sukkah easily, such as a hearty soup or casserole made with vegetables that reflect the autumn harvest. Stuffed foods made with a chopped or "beaten" filling are traditional fare on Sukkot, when we beat willow branches in our prayer for rain.

Sukkot suggestions include such enticing dishes as Ladder Challah, Sesame-and-Herb-Stuffed Grape Leaves, Chicken with Dates, Olive Oil and 12 Garlic Cloves, Lamb Stew with Chickpeas, Pomegranates, Squash and Cilantro, Back to the Roots Casserole, and Pears in Red Wine and Spices.

Here is a lovely dairy menu for Sukkot that reflects the flavours of the harvest. These superb stuffed mushrooms reflect the Sukkot tradition of stuffed foods. They have received rave reviews as appetizers, hors d'oeuvres or even as a vegetarian main course. Enjoy…

16 large mushrooms
3 tbsp. grated Parmesan, Cheddar or Monterey Jack cheese
1 large garlic clove, minced
1/3 cup finely chopped onion
1 tbsp. sunflower seeds, toasted (chop them if you like)
1 cup toasted wheat germ
1 tbsp. chopped fresh Italian parsley
1 tsp. chopped fresh oregano or basil
2 tbsp. butter, melted
salt
freshly ground black pepper
6 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil (or olive oil mixed with other oil)

Preheat the oven to 350. Grease a large oven-to-table casserole or baking pan with 2 tbsp. olive oil. Set aside.

Rinse or clean mushrooms and gently remove the stems. (Set aside the stems for use in a soup or an omelette.) In a small bowl, mix together the remaining ingredients, except for olive oil. Use a spoon to pack the filling into the mushroom caps and the back of the spoon to press it down.

Place the stuffed mushrooms in the prepared pan. Pour the remaining oil equally over the top. Bake for 20 minutes, or until golden. Serve warm. Makes 16.

SPICED BUTTERNUT SQUASH SOUP

This deep-orange autumn soup with its creamy light texture is a delicious way to start a holiday meal. Vary the recipe by substituting pumpkin or sweet potatoes for the squash, or mix them if desired.

4 1/2 pounds butternut squash, pumpkin or sweet potatoes
3 tbsp. extra-virgin olive or other oil
2/3 cup chopped red onion
5 garlic cloves, minced
1 tsp. sweet paprika
1 tsp. ground allspice or baharat*
1/2 tsp. chili pepper
2 tsp. salt
6 cups water (or more to cover)
1/2 cup crème fraîche, yogurt, dairy sour cream, sweet cream or half-and-half
1/3 cup mixed fresh finely chopped cilantro and Italian parsley (or all parsley)

Scrub butternut squash well and cut off the stem end. Slice in half lengthwise and remove the seeds and strands. Peel and cut into cubes.

In a large soup pot with cover, heat the oil and saute the onion over medium heat, stirring occasionally, until transparent and lightly golden. Add the garlic and saute 1 minute. Add the butternut squash cubes, paprika, allspice or baharat, chili pepper and salt. Add 6 cups water (or just enough to cover the squash) and bring to a boil. Cover and cook over medium-low heat, about 30 to 40 minutes, until squash is fork-tender.

Remove from heat and puree in batches in a blender or food processor. Return to the pot and cook an additional 5 minutes (or reheat gently just before serving). Divide among bowls and garnish each with a tablespoon of crème fraîche, yogurt, sour cream or a zigzag pattern of cream, and garnish each with 1 1/2 tsp. of the cilantro-parsley mixture, or pass small bowls of different toppings and let guests garnish their own. Serves 8.

Calgary concert honours the artists of Terezin

By JAMES TARRANT
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — A concert honouring some of the artists who created their works in Terezin during World War II was presented Sept. 26 by the Calgary Jewish Community Council and Calgary Pro Musica Society.

The concert was not so much about remembering the Holocaust as about honoring the creativity of those imprisoned, said Gertrude Cohos, past president of the Calgary Jewish Community Council.

"It is important to remember the spirit of these people. Despite their terrible conditions, they managed to create something that was truly beautiful. And to do their very best to live a life under the most horrendous circumstances."

"Defiant Sparks, Music of the Holocaust," presented at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue, featured internationally renowned pianist Ralf Gothoni and the Ives Quartet, with narration by local actors Emily Talia and Joyce Doolittle.

The concert commemorated the works of four composers who were interned in the Terezin camp 35 miles north of Prague that was used by the Nazis as a holding area for Jews before their deportation to the gas chambers. It was also used as propaganda to show the outside world the Nazis' humane treatment of Jewish prisoners, and with that goal, authorities encouraged a wide range of entertainment activities, especially musical performances. Choral groups were formed, pianists gave concerts and music was composed.

The music performed at the recent concert comes from the Terezin collection of some 50 works for varying ensembles, which survived the war years.

The concert also focused on remembrance, because in the final years of the war, the inmates of Terezin suffered the same fate that befell Jews imprisoned in other camps. Records show that there were about 140,000 people in Terezin between 1941 and 1944, but only 16,000 survived. Three of the four musicians honoured at the concert survived in the camp.

Talia and Doolittle read excerpts from authors who had direct or indirect experience with the genocide and living conditions in these camps.

For Talia, the event was personal – she is a third generation Holocaust survivor.

"There is definitely an influence on my creativity and my life because of what my grandparents went though. My grandparents spent two months in Auschwitz. My grandfather was a well-known speaker at local high schools and in symposiums around Calgary. He was in Oskar Schindler's factory… And my grandmother in Vancouver still speaks a couple times a week all over British Columbia. She was liberated after the death march out of the prison camp in Auschwitz."

Talia says her family background influences who she is today, and thus being a narrator for this event is special.

"I always wanted to use my profession, which is theatre, as a medium to do what my grandparents were doing – Holocaust education. I can't go into a high school with the same effectiveness and talk about my experiences in the camps. But I'm trained in theatre, voice and dance. I've always drifted toward projects that have allowed me to express those things that move people on that topic of racial acceptance and anti-Semitism. And learning from our past. If I can use my skills to do that, then I've succeeded."

The poems read were After the Holocaust by David Koenig, Hollow Cost by Jobe Smith, Juliek's Violin by Michael Blumenthal, A Few More Things about the Holocaust by Beatrice H. Lifshitz, The Second Generation by Menachem Z. Rosensaft, Blood to Remember – American Poets on the Holocaust, edited by Charles Ades, and Ghost Children by Lillian Boraks-Nemetz.

This was one of the few times Calgary Pro Musica has staged a concert outside of the University of Calgary campus. The decision to have the event at Beth Tzedec was to give Jewish and non-Jewish members of Calgary and surrounding community a chance to witness this beautiful music, Cohos said.

BBYO FALL CONVENTION: From Sept. 23 to 25, teens from Greater Toronto Area BBYO gathered at Camp Northland for leadership training and an opportunity to explore their Jewish values while basking in the beautiful outdoor setting.

U of T student rallies for peace in Mideast

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

In an effort to promote dialogue on campus between Jewish and Muslim students about the conflict in the Middle East, Jonathan Stein is in the process of planning a week-long Peace Rally.

"One of my goals is to get to the people who are undecided [about the conflict], educate them and provide them with an unbiased look at the situation," said the 20-year-old University of Toronto student who is currently studying politics and history, but has ambitions to major in peace and conflict studies.

Stein hopes to lure experts from both sides of the Middle East conflict, to offer their points of view about the problem and posit possible solutions.

"The purpose of this rally is to unite the entire U of T campus in the rallying cry towards a just and fair settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict."

The Peace Rally, which he hopes to schedule by February or March of 2006, will become a week-long series of events that will not just feature lectures but will be a cultural celebration as well, with music and Middle Eastern food.

"Still, this will be a political-oriented event, as each day will have a different focus. One day we'll talk about Jerusalem, one day we'll talk about the settlements…" Stein said.

He said he wants his event to steer clear from comparisons to one-sided events, such as the recent Israel Apartheid Week at U of T and some events put together by Jewish campus groups.

"I'm trying to bring together both sides, with moderate people. I don't want inflammatory right-wingers or left-wingers," said Stein, who has been a part of Hashomer Hatzair-Kidma – "a progressive Zionist organization that believes in the principles of social justice" – since he was 12 years old.

He said he thinks that extremists on both sides, which represent a small fraction of the populations, get all the media attention and wants the rally to shift the focus to the moderates.

"Extremists have too much say – on both sides."

Stein said while he is still looking for people to fill positions in the programming, public relations and financing department, he is already in the process of contacting people he would like to speak.

He also has ambitions to co-ordinate the event with other campuses across North America.

But ultimately, he wants to contribute to the peace process in any way he knows how.

"I want to bring a fair and balanced dialogue to campus and to promote peace and coexistence on campus. We're looking to educate," he said.

Conference to focus on Darfur situation

Some of North America's most notable scholars will gather in London, Ont., at the end of the month to inform the public about the genocide in Darfur.

The University of Western Ontario will host the weekend-long conference from Oct. 28 to 30 in hopes that those who learn about the issue will become active in raising awareness.

The genocide scholars who are scheduled to lecture include Dr. Gerald Caplan, a leading Canadian authority on genocide and genocide prevention, and an internationally recognized expert on the Rwandan Genocide.

Also speaking at the conference is Dr. Norman Epstein,who is the co-founder of Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan.

The conference was organized by the Holocaust Literature Research Institute as well as scholarly centres, student groups, and community and hot-for-profit organizations.

Internal Palestinian feuding increases

By ARNON REGULAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

GAZA CITY — A senior member of the Palestinian general intelligence service was abducted and shot by unknown gunmen in the Gaza Strip, Palestinian sources said last Friday.

According to the sources, Sami Ajour, who is also a Fatah member, was snatched Thursday and later dumped in the street in the northern Gaza town of Beit Lahiya with serious gunshot wounds.

The sources said the ensuing abduction of three Hamas officials in the West Bank late Thursday had been carried out by Fatah members in response to the kidnapping.

But a previously unknown Palestinian group said earlier Friday that it was behind the kidnappings of the Hamas members, accusing the militant group of putting itself above the law.

The incidence of kidnappings among rival Palestinian groups has increased in recent months, as Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' efforts to restore law and order have achieved only partial success.

A group calling itself the Omar bin al-Khatab Brigades claimed responsibility for the abductions.

"This is a response to Hamas' violations and disregard for law and order and their attacks on security institutions and Palestinian leaders," the group said in a leaflet. "We warn Hamas and ask them to stop their policy and learn their lessons. This is our first response."

Al-Raz, a prominent university professor, was released early Friday, hours after he was snatched from his West Bank home.

Palestinian police went door-to-door early Friday in the West Bank town of Yatta, arresting 30 suspected criminals in one of the biggest moves toward restoring law and order in the chaos-ridden Palestinian territories.

More than 200 policemen participated in Friday's arrest raid, searching for drug and arms dealers and other wanted criminals, said Ahmed Rabai, the Hebron-area police chief. Village residents said they could not recall such a heavy crackdown by Palestinian police.

Police raided the village before dawn, surrounded homes and called on suspects to surrender. Homes were searched and illegal weapons were confiscated.

"This campaign was ordered by political leaders to enforce law and order and to bring justice to normal Palestinians and make the Palestinian people feel safe," Rabai said. "This campaign will continue, not only in Yatta town, but also in other villages and in the city of Hebron itself."

Israel ponders policies towards Hamas

The recent deterioration in Hamas' status began when rockets the group was parading at a Sept. 23 march celebrating the Israeli withdrawal exploded unexpectedly, killing 21 people and wounding more than 100. Hamas falsely accused Israel for the incident and launched dozens of rockets on Sderot and neighbouring Israeli communities just over the Gaza border.

Israel retaliated by renewing its targeted killings of leading terrorists, shelling targets in Gaza and undertaking a massive arrest campaign of Hamas activists in the West Bank. Hamas leadership realized too late that Palestinian public opinion had little sympathy for the group's provocations.

PA President Mahmoud Abbas came out strongly against the Hamas attempt to put the blame on Israel. Gaza residents, who had hoped the Israeli pullout would finally bring peace and quiet, were furious at Hamas for giving Israel a reason to close down the territories, arrest militants and continue with the state of insecurity that was so familiar in pre-withdrawal days.

Some Israelis feel now is the time to continue pounding Hamas until it's too weak to win the really important elections, those for the Palestinian Legislative Council scheduled for Jan. 25, 2006.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon recently promised that Israel would not facilitate those elections if Hamas takes part. Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz threatened that Hamas leaders may not live to see election day.

But though Hamas has suffered blows, there's no knockout in sight, and Mofaz knows it. He has threatened to send Hamas leaders "to the places of Ahmad Yassin and [Abdel Aziz] Rantissi" – Hamas leaders Israel assassinated in 2004 – and warned that Israeli artillery along the Gaza border is not there for decoration. But Mofaz knows there are limitations: Israel can't bomb Gaza at random lest the shells hit innocent people.

Moreover, harsh punitive measures, such as renewed target killings and massive arrests, easily could ignite another round of bloody violence.

The Kassam attack was preceded by targeted killings of three Islamic Jihad terrorists in Tulkarm. It was followed by additional fatal clashes and the arrests of 441 people in the West Bank, including 40 people with some political followings.

The arrests did make it more difficult for Hamas to prepare for the municipal elections. If the pattern continues, Hamas will find it even more difficult to prepare for January's general elections.

But can Israel echo U.S. President George W. Bush's statements about democratizing the Middle East while putting Abbas' political opponents behind bars or in cemeteries? Will the next Palestinian Parliament be viable if the results of the elections are impacted by Israeli arrests?

"Let us not delude ourselves," Brig.-Gen. Ya'ir Golan, Israel's West Bank commander, said in an interview with Ma'ariv. "We cannot run the politics of the Palestinians."

Then he disclosed one of Israel's secret fears: "It may very well be that the feeling of persecution will bring Hamas more votes."

Golan was articulating a major Israeli dilemma. For years, Israel boycotted any dialogue with the Palestine Liberation Organization because it supported terrorism. Even so, the PLO became the major political force of the Palestinian people until, at Oslo, Israel negotiated with it.

Of course, the condition for political negotiations was that the PLO formally renounced terrorism and accepted Israel's right to exist. Those who object to Hamas' participation in Palestinian elections say Israel is not attempting to dictate Palestinian politics, but note that a political party doesn't hold ballots in one hand and guns in the other.

If Hamas meets the conditions the PLO did, they say, it too can participate in the elections as a legitimate political party.

But Israel faces the danger that Hamas might become the main beneficiary of any stalemate in the political process. A June poll of the Palestinian Center for Public Opinion predicted a strong Hamas showing in the next Parliament, with nearly 27 per cent of the seats, compared to 35 per cent for Fatah, with the rest going to various left-wing parties and independents.

Another pollster, Khalil Shikaki of Ramallah, predicted that Hamas would gain as much as 30 per cent to 35 per cent of the seats, with 45 per cent going to Fatah.

Hamas can't just sit back and wait for miracles in January – it needs to work hard in the Palestinian street and make the difficult choice between violence and politics.

At first glance, it seems Hamas has learned a lesson. In the face of the tough Israeli retaliation, the Palestinian factions on Sept. 27 reaffirmed their commitment to a "ceasefire" that was declared last winter but that they frequently ignored.

The pressure is strong on both sides: U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned that Hamas can't participate in the Palestinian political process unless it disarms, but U.S. pressure is also heavy on Israel. The Americans are concerned that continued blows to Hamas may hurt Abbas. Abbas has said that Israeli raids were undermining his efforts to keep the peace.

For Israel, the dilemma remains: how much damage can be inflicted on Hamas until the attacks end up tipping the balance and strengthening the group?

If Hamas does well in January's elections, Israel hopes power may force the group to change. "If Hamas wins in the elections, government responsibility will compel it to behave differently," Golan said.

World Bank wants road linking Gaza

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The World Bank supports building a transit-passage between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank in the form of a sunken road, but Prime Minister Ariel Sharon favours a rail link because managing security would be easier, Ha'aretz has learned.

The United States will finance a study examining options for linking the Gaza Strip and the West Bank via Israel.

The Israeli response to the study, which is due to be completed in January, "will indicate its future intentions regarding a Palestinian state that would maintain contact between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip," a diplomatic source said last week.

The study was initiated by the World Bank, which asked for American sponsorship to moderate Israel's anticipated objection to its conclusions.

Israel approved the study initiative at a meeting last week between Nigel Roberts, World Bank director for the West Bank and Gaza, and Baruch Spiegel, an adviser to Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz. The U.S. administration gave the project funding on the condition that both parties can come to an agreement.

The study will examine transit options such as a multi-lane road crossing Israel in a deep trench, an elevated road and a rail link between the Erez checkpoint with northern Gaza and the Tarqumiya checkpoint near Hebron. The Palestinian Authority would be responsible for the passage, according to the plans.

An Israeli report prepared in 2001, during the first months of the intifadah, recommended that a road be built, partly at ground level and partly sunken or elevated.

A passage between the two parts of the PA was at the centre of the disengagement talks held among Israel, the PA and the U.S. The Palestinians were concerned that the pullout from the Gaza Strip would be the end of the process and that Israel planned to separate the Strip and the West Bank. That's why they demanded a transit passage between them, even a temporary one.

Mofaz and the Quartet's (the Quartet is made up of the European Union, Russia, the United Nations and the United States) envoy to the region, James Wolfensohn, have discussed opening an experimental passage from Gaza to the West Bank, using bus and later truck convoys accompanied by Israeli vehicles.

Sharon, Abbas scheduled to meet

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Top Palestinian and Israeli officials agreed last Friday to hold a further round of talks prior to a summit between Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas that was scheduled for this week.

Dov Weissglas, chief of the Israeli Prime Minister's Office, and Saeb Erekat, chief Palestinian negotiator, met Friday in Tel Aviv to iron out the details of the upcoming summit. Israeli government officials said before the meeting that the two might meet again early this week.

The Sharon-Abbas summit was to take place Tuesday, less than 10 days after an earlier planned summit was cancelled because of the flare-up in violence in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Palestinian sources said there was a "real chance" that Jordanian King Abdullah II would attend the Sharon-Abbas talks.

Both sides want to reach understandings on the most pressing issues, including Israel's demands that the Palestinians rein in militants and the Palestinian demand that Israel release prisoners before the summit, Erekat said.

"We don't want a failed summit. We want a successful summit. We want to agree on the substance," Erekat said.

The meeting Friday covered details of the summit as well as trying to reach an agreement on the terms of release for long-term Palestinians prisoners and the further withdrawal of Israeli troops from West Bank cities.

The sides also agreed Friday to establish two teams to formalize the arrangements for the Rafah crossing between Sinai and the southern Gaza Strip. The crossing will be jointly run by Israel and the PA, with supervision by European Union inspectors and surveillance systems that will convey information to the Israeli side.

Meanwhile, Israeli government sources said before the talks that Israel will consider what steps it can take to ease the situation for the Palestinians.

They said Sharon was not likely to approve transferring ammunition to the PA's security forces. But Israel Radio reported Friday that the Israel Defence Forces planned to recommend that Israel approve the ammunition transfer.

Among topics that were expected to be on the agenda of the Sharon-Abbas summit were the renewal of talks on the operation of border crossings from the PA to Israel, the future of the crossing point between the Gaza Strip and Sinai, the implementation of the Sharm al-Sheikh agreements for the withdrawal of the Israel Defence Forces from West Bank towns and the freeing of Palestinian prisoners.

Israel planned to reiterate its demand that the Palestinians put a halt to terror, and to express its opposition to allowing Hamas to participate in Palestinian parliamentary elections.

The last meeting between the two leaders was June 21, when they agreed to co-ordinate the implementation of the disengagement plan. Since then, apart from a few telephone conversations, they have not been in touch.

Abbas is due to meet with U.S. President George W. Bush in Washington on Oct. 20, and both sides would like to demonstrate diplomatic progress before that.

Guilty plea in AIPAC case

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Lawrence Franklin's plea-bargain pledge to co-operate with the U.S. government in its case against two former AIPAC officials was put to the test as soon as it was made.

"It was unclassified and it is unclassified," Franklin, a former Pentagon analyst, insisted in court last week, describing a document that the government maintains is classified. The document is central to one of the conspiracy charges against Steve Rosen, the former foreign policy chief of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

Guilty pleas are usually remorseful, and sedate. But Franklin was defiant and agitated as he pleaded guilty as part of a deal that may leave him with a reduced sentence and part of his government pension.

His prickliness could prove another setback for the government in a case that the presiding judge has suggested could be dismissed because of questions about the defence's access to evidence obtained through wiretapped conversations.

Franklin's performance unsettled prosecutors, who will attempt to prove that Rosen and Keith Weissman, AIPAC's former Iran analyst, conspired with Franklin to communicate secret information. The case goes to trial Jan. 2.

The argument over the faxed document provided the most dramatic encounter last week.

"It was a list of murders," Franklin began to explain to U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis when a Justice Department lawyer leapt from his seat, shouting, "Your Honour, that's classified!"

Ellis agreed to seal that portion of the hearing. JTA has learned that the fax was a list of terrorist incidents believed to have been backed by Iran.

There were other elements of Franklin's plea that suggest he is not ready to co-operate to the fullest extent.

The government says Franklin leaked information to the AIPAC employees because he thought it could advance his career, but he says he was frustrated with policy on Iran at the Pentagon.

Franklin said he believed Rosen and Weissman were better connected than he and would be able to relay his concerns to officials at the White House's National Security Council.

He did not explicitly mention in court that Iran was his concern. But JTA has learned that Franklin thought his superiors at the Pentagon were overly distracted by the Iraq war in 2003 – when he established contact with Rosen and Weissman – and weren't paying enough attention to Iran.

The U.S. penal code criminalizes relaying information that "could be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of any foreign nation." Franklin's testimony would not be much use to the prosecution if he believed Rosen and Weissman simply were relaying information from the Pentagon to the White House, sources close to the defence of Rosen and Weissman said.

"I was convinced they would relay this information back-channel to friends on the NSC," Franklin said.

The section of the penal code that deals with civilians who obtain and relay classified information has rarely, if ever, been used in a prosecution, partly because it runs up against U.S. First Amendment protections for journalists and lobbyists, who often deal with secrets.

A spokesperson for Rosen's lawyer said Franklin's guilty plea "has no impact on our case because a government employee's actions in dealing with classified information is simply not the same as a private person, whether that person is a reporter or a lobbyist."

The essence of Franklin's plea seemed to be only that he knew the recipients were unauthorized to receive the information. Beyond that, he insisted, he had no criminal intent.

Admitting guilt to another charge, relaying information to Naor Gilon, the chief political officer at the Israeli Embassy in Washington, Franklin said that he wasn't giving away anything that the Israeli didn't already know. "He gave me far more information than I gave him," Franklin added.

Franklin turned prosecutors' heads when he named Gilon, the first public confirmation that the foreign country hinted at in indictments is Israel. Indictments refer to a "foreign official."

The suggestion that Franklin was mining Gilon for information, and not the other way around, turns on its head the hype around the case when it was first revealed in late August 2004, after the FBI raided AIPAC's offices. At the time, CBS described Franklin as an "Israeli spy."

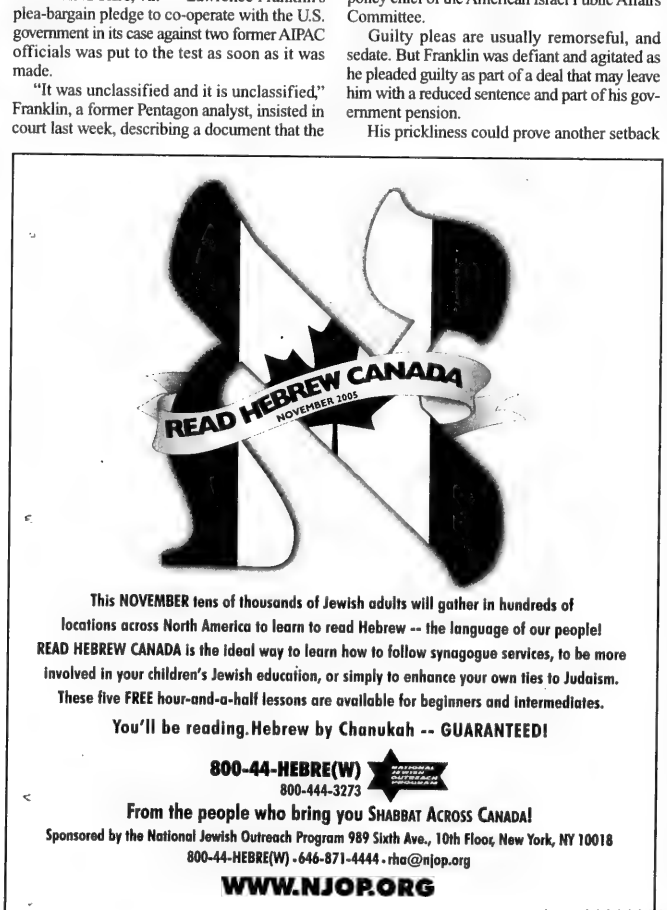
Franklin, who has five children and an ill wife, said he is in dire financial straits. Keeping part of his pension for his wife was key to his plea deal, his lawyer said.

He pleaded guilty to three charges, one relating to his alleged dealings with the former AIPAC officials; one having to do with Gilon; and one for taking classified documents home.

Franklin is not all the government has up its sleeve. The charges against Rosen and Weissman, apparently based on wiretapped conversations, allege the two former AIPAC staffers shared classified information with fellow AIPAC staffers, the media and foreign officials.

The problem with the wiretap evidence lies in the government's refusal to share much of it or even to say exactly how much it has.

AIPAC fired Rosen and Weissman in April but is paying for their defence. AIPAC had no comment, nor did Weissman's lawyers.



Katsav to visit Vatican

Israel's president will visit Pope Benedict XVI in the first visit to the Vatican by an Israeli head of state. Moshe Katsav will visit Rome in mid-November, Israeli officials announced this weekend. The visit will be the latest in a series of steps Benedict has taken since his election to demonstrate his commitment to furthering Jewish-Catholic relations.

Arabs for Zion?

Most of Israel's Arab citizens accept Zionism, a poll found. According to the Hebrew University poll released this week, 63 per cent of Israeli Arabs believe in the principle of two states for two peoples, whereby Palestinians gain independence in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and Israel serves as the Jewish state. Thirty-four per cent of respondents express opposition to the Zionist principle. The findings appeared to counter the hard-line rhetoric of many Israeli Arab leaders, who demand that Israel abandon its principles as a Jewish state.

Court halts army tactic

Israel's High Court of Justice banned an army practice of using Palestinian civilians to help locate terrorists. After three years of deliberations, the High Court found in favour of petitions filed by human-rights groups against the "advance notice" tactic, whereby Israeli troops on counterterrorist raids ask Palestinian bystanders to go to fugitives' hideouts and persuade them to surrender. The three-justice panel disputed the army's position that the practice is voluntary, and said it violates international law by endangering civilians. Some Israeli lawmakers denounced the ruling. Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Dan Halutz said the army would implement the court's ruling.

Shalom writes for peace

Israel's foreign minister published an editorial in an Indonesian newspaper calling for rapprochement with the Muslim world. "Israel does not see Islam as an enemy, and has never seen it as such. On the contrary, history has shown us that Jews and Muslims lived in peace, harmony and friendship for many years in the past. This should be the aim in the future," Silvan Shalom wrote in the Jakarta Post. "At this time of renewed hope for progress toward peace in the Middle East, we believe that the time is ripe to promote dialogue with all countries." The publication of an article by a senior Israeli official was unprecedented for Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim country, which has no ties with Israel. Shalom has vowed to capitalize on global goodwill garnered from the recent Gaza Strip withdrawal to normalize Israel's relations with the Arab and Muslim world.

Israeli ship implicated in accident

Israel's biggest shipping company said one of its vessels was involved in a deadly accident off Japan's coast. Zim offered apologies and compensation to the families of seven Japanese fisherman who died in a collision with one of its tankers last week near the northern island of Hokkaido. Zim originally had denied involvement. Israel's Transportation Ministry has said it will aid in the investigation.

Bush: Fight terrorism to protect Israel

America must fight terrorists because they could destroy Israel, U.S. President George W. Bush said. In an address to the National Endowment on Democracy, Bush sought to explain a foreign policy that has become bogged down in the Iraq war. Bush cast Iraq as central to his war on terrorism and cited a litany of catastrophic outcomes should terrorists prevail, among them the destruction of Israel. "With greater economic and military and political power, the terrorists would be able to advance their stated agenda: to develop weapons of mass destruction, to destroy Israel, to intimidate Europe, to assault the American people and to blackmail our government into isolation," he said.

Looming lulav shortage shakes Jewish world

By CHANAN TIGAY
JTA

NEW YORK — U.S. legislators, Israeli officials and Jewish groups were working diplomatic channels last week in an effort to stave off a looming lulav shortage ahead of Sukkot.

Their efforts follow a surprise move by Egypt, which – after years as the world's primary supplier of the palm fronds that form the spine of the ritual lulav – said it would no longer provide the leaves to suppliers in the United States, Israel and beyond.

"We've got everybody on the case, and I told them to shake a leg," U.S. Congressman Gary Ackerman, a New York Democrat, told JTA, pun intended.

Ackerman raised the issue in meetings with the Egyptian ambassador to the United States and America's ambassador to Egypt, and he said he also has a call in to Osama el Baz, a top political adviser to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

In addition, Senator Rick Santorum, a Pennsylvania Republican, has sent a letter to the Egyptian ambassador urging Egypt to "consider the needs of Jewish communities around the world and allow for a sufficient number of these palm fronds to be exported this year."

Staff members from the office of Representative Eliot Engel, another New York Democrat, have also voiced concerns to the Egyptian Embassy.

Israel's Ministry of Agriculture is also in contact with its Egyptian counterpart, which has said that palm-leaf exports had to be cut because removing the fronds damages the trees.

The pressure seems to be having some effect: Israeli officials say they now believe some lulav shipments from Egypt – the source in past years of about one million lulavs worldwide – could go forward, and Rabbi Abba Cohen, Washington director and counsel for Agudath Israel of America, said last week he'd received word from the Egyptians that "a partial release" was in the works.

Still, with a significant cut in the number of lulavs reaching distributors still likely, Jewish officials are concerned they may shortly have a "lulav crisis" on their hands for Sukkot, which falls this year in mid-October.

"The Egyptian action will not only create a tremendous shortage, so that some people won't have lulavim, but those who do might have to pay an exorbitant price," Rabbi Cohen said.

Rabbi Cohen said his group has been in contact with the Egyptian Embassy, the White House and the U.S. State Department on the issue.

Egypt's concerns are backed up by horticulturalists, who say removing the fronds could damage a tree's ability to produce fruit and thrive.

"It is detrimental to the health of the palm to remove the green, productive leaves," said John Begeman, a horticulture agent with the University of Arizona's College of Agriculture and Life Sciences, in Tucson. "They are doing the work of the palm in manufacturing food" through photosynthesis.

Date palms typically have 15 to 20 healthy green leaves at any one time, and removal of leaves should be limited to the dead and dying brown leaves at the trees' base, Begeman said.

The Encyclopedia Judaica translates the Hebrew word lulav as "a young branch of a tree" or "a shoot."

The lulav is one of the arba'ah minim, or four plant species, that are joined together and shaken on Sukkot. The others are willows and myrtle, which are bound to the lulav with strips of palm; and the etrog, or citron, which is held beside the lulav as it is waved.

Calls to the Egyptian Embassy in Washington were not returned.

Those in contact with the Egyptians say they have been receptive to Jewish concerns. No one interviewed believed that the Egyptian move was politically motivated. They said they hoped the Egyptians might take steps to cushion the blow in light of the appeals.

"We're surely sensitive" to Egypt's needs, Rabbi Cohen said. "What we're looking for is some way to allow them to pursue what's in their best interest, but at the same time allow us to adjust and develop or tap into other sources."

Rabbi Cohen suggested, for example, that instead of cutting off lulav shipments all at once, a decrease could be gradual.

While Egypt has long been the major producer of lulavs – the majority come from the El Arish region of northern Sinai – some distributors have gotten portions of their supplies from California, Arizona and Israel. In light of the news out of Egypt, several Israeli distributors reportedly visited Jordan recently to determine if the Hashemite Kingdom could become a new source.

As Erev Rosh Hashanah fell, U.S. Judaica stores that supply lulavs to local consumers were unsure about the status of their orders.

"I'm very nervous about it," said Madelyn Heyman, proprietor of Bala Judaica in suburban Philadelphia.

Heyman said her distributor had promised that the lulavs would arrive – and had already raised the price on them.

"It's very unusual just to raise the price on the one item," she said. "We sell them as a set."

Heyman was able to get relatively inexpensive etrogs, so she wasn't planning to raise the price on the lulav-etrog sets.

"I'm hoping that we're all wrong and that there's going to be plenty of supply," she said. "We have to be optimistic at this time."

The vibrant, expressive colours of Sam Borenstein

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The expressive colours of Sam Borenstein seem to jump off the canvas.

Borenstein (1908-1969) was an Anglo-Jewish Quebec painter whose Montreal cityscapes, Laurentian landscapes and poignant portraitures were the acme of vibrancy.

Thirty-six of his canvases are now on view at the Justina M. Barnicke Gallery, in Hart House, on the campus of the University of Toronto.

Previously shown at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts, "A Passion for Colour: Expressionist Art of Sam Borenstein," runs until Nov. 3. The exhibit then moves to Mount Allison University in Sackville, N.B.

Portrait of Judith

Borenstein, the youngest of 15 children, was born in Lithuania. He and his family arrived in Canada in 1921 and settled in Montreal, a hub of eastern European Jewish immigrants.

The son of a stern religious Jew who frowned upon graven images, Borenstein had little formal education. Apprenticed as a furrier, he toiled in a garment factory, dreaming of being a painter.

Many years would elapse before he could finally support himself and his beloved wife and muse, Judith, as an artist. To make ends meet, he also drove a taxi, sold friends' paintings, dealt in antiques and operated a store.

In the face of adversity and setbacks, a lesser man might have buckled and given up the quest to devote himself, body and soul, to painting. But Borenstein persisted, turning out a panoply of emotionally charged works, which date from the 1930s to the 1960s.

"Explosive colours, dynamic brushwork and compelling energy are the distinguishing characteristics of [his] paintings," writes Loren Lerner – the curator who organized the current show – in the handsome catalogue Sam Borenstein.

"He was extremely forceful," observes Judi Schwartz, the director of the Justina M. Barnicke Gallery.

"He was very bold in his approach," says Borenstein's daughter, Joyce, whose exceptional film, The Colours of my Father: A Portrait of Sam Borenstein, was nominated for an Academy Award several years ago.

Joyce Borenstein, who was here for the official opening with her sister Erin, added, "He was impetuous, emotional and audacious."

Influenced by the Impressionists, Borenstein was a whirlwind of vitality, virtually finishing an oil painting within a day, and then lovingly applying the final touches to it.

Sam Borenstein as a young man

Borenstein enjoyed the bucolic charms of the Laurentian mountains, a summer retreat for Montreal Jews. In his paintings of this region, his love of the land shines through.

Camp Bertrand (1943) is a pastiche of glowing reds and greens. Early Sunflowers (1960) bursts out in a flourish of shades of yellow. St. Lucie in Motion (1964) is kinetic and cubist by origin. St. Bruno (1967) is an explosion of blues, reds and greens. St. Margarite Station (1943), which is calm and collected, is more of a conventional work.

Green Mountain (1968), one of his last pieces, is quintessential Borenstein. Tactile and abstract, it erupts in a wave of colours and highlights his palette knifework technique.

Near Sainte-Agathe (1960) portrays a perfect summer day in the country and harks back, perhaps, to rural Lithuania.

St. Lucie in Winter (1964), which was acquired by the Jewish General Hospital, is an example of his attention to detail. In Eagle (1965), Borenstein's respect and adoration of the power of nature is plainly evident.

Borenstein's portraitures, drawn from the hearth of his family and the circle of his friends, are psychologically penetrating.

Portrait of my Father (1943), a charcoal drawing, portrays a glowering and unsympathetic man in geometric patterns, while Father (1947), rendered in reddish hues, summons up intimations of the devil.

Borenstein's works are exhibited in some of the finest galleries in Canada and the United States today, and this exhibit may burnish his growing reputation. He was truly a Canadian master.

Cantors' hall of fame to pay tribute to chazzan Bagley

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Asking the most revered cantors in the world to voluntarily perform at a concert thousands of miles away would likely require some extraordinary reason for them to oblige.

Paying tribute to famed chazzan David Bagley happens to be such a reason.

On Nov.1, a veritable cantors' hall of fame will converge at the Toronto Centre for the Arts for a gala concert in honour of Bagley, the 73-year-old former chazzan at Toronto's Beth Radom and Beth Sholom synagogues.

Coming from such far-flung places as Belgium and Israel, the cantors will sing a bevy of material both performed and composed by Bagley during his illustrious half-century career.

"All these cantors are volunteering...because there is such respect for David Bagley," says Beth Sholom synagogue Cantor Eric Moses, the concert's producer.

> 'Cantors are performing because there is such respect for David Bagley'

"There is a tremendous sense of admiration for his charisma and talent as a chazzan, and probably for the interpersonal dealings he's had with these people throughout his career."

Indeed, Bagley has inspired and moved colleagues, congregants and concert audiences across the globe.

Many of the cantors at the upcoming concert have warm memories from performing with or watching Bagley in action.

"On [one] Motzai Shabbat, David led the Havdalah service to an audience of over 3,000 people standing shoulder-to-shoulder," recalls chazzan Moshe Schulhof of Florida.

"His spectacular voice filled the sanctuary with overwhelming sounds, as well as emotion."

The Toronto concert will feature such melodies as Harninu Goyim Amo and Hene-ne, which Bagley composed, as well as a DVD presentation of archived material showcasing some of his performances of the 1970s and 1980s.

In addition to singing solo, the cantors will join together as a group to present a special chassidic medley.

That kind of medley was likely the first type of tune Bagley heard as a child growing up in Vilna.

Born there in 1932, Bagley was the son of a rabbi who sought to save his family from the horrors of the Holocaust by fleeing to Japan during WWII.

The Bagleys later went to Shanghai for six years and then on to America, first to San Francisco, then New York City.

In New York, Bagley started to cultivate his musical genius.

After being ordained as a rabbi, he learned musical theory, studying with Cantor Louis Lipitz and Madame Chernova.

Like many new cantors, Bagley was quite itinerant, crafting his trade in various places, including Brooklyn, Chicago and Indiana.

International opportunities arose in the 1960s, with Bagley first shuttling off to Mexico, followed by Ramat Gan, Israel and then Johannesburg, South Africa.

Moses, who has interviewed Bagley and archived his work, says the chazzan's favourite experience was in Israel.

"The chazzanim used to walk for miles and miles to listen to him…perform Shabbes services in Ramat Gan," enthuses Moses, who will MC the concert.

"He has this remarkable range of material and the capability to sing very diverse types of music, from Yiddish, to opera and traditional chazzanut, without even thinking about it."

Bagley came to Canada in the late 1970s, singing at congregations in both Toronto and Montreal.

Some of his most cherished work occurred in the 1980s, when the American Society for the Advancement of Cantorial Arts, spearheaded by Chaim Weiner, organized unique concerts in Soviet bloc countries.

"One of the most spectacular and memorable experiences in my career was the historic concert tour of Romania and Moscow around Chanukah [time] in 1988," recalls Schulhof.

"David's voice was then in its prime. He was the senior member of the tour to whom we looked up (to) as a model of what a great chazzan was."

In 1999, a few years after moving back to Toronto from Montreal to be cantor and rabbi at Beth Radom Synagogue, Bagley suffered a debilitating stroke.

He now lives at Baycrest Hospital and half of his body is paralyzed.

To help cater to his health needs, part of the proceeds from the concert will be directed to assisting with Bagley's care at Baycrest.

In addition, money raised at the concert will be administered by the Toronto Cantorial Trust Fund to help establish a scholarship for cantorial arts in Bagley's honour.

Toronto-born actress begins new season on The Collector

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Unlike most successful actors, Ellen Dubin didn't grow up fantasizing about being on the silver screen.

"I never wanted to be an actor... I wanted to be a ballet dancer."

Dubin, who grew up in a neighbourhood she describes as "a little Italy with Jewish culture" in the Glencairn Avenue and Bathurst Street area, explained that when she sustained a serious knee injury at 19 and could no longer dance, she didn't want to give up on the exhilaration she felt when she performed in front of an audience.

When she enrolled at the University of Toronto and took theatre classes, she "fell in love with performing for an audience."

While she is most famous for her role as a Tupperware-obsessed mom in the cult hit Napolean Dynamite, her resume includes many diverse roles.

"I consider myself a chameleon," she said, referring to her ability to take on roles, whether they are in science fiction, comedy or dramatic films.

"I can be an Irish farm girl one day and a journalist another day.

"But I love doing comedy on stage. When you have to wait for people to stop laughing to go on, that's funny," she said.

She explained that regardless of the roles she chooses, each one requires that she does extensive research.

"If I do a period piece, I research the part... It's like a history lesson, a cultural lesson."

She attributes this kind of dedication to the role to her Hebrew school education.

"I was studying Hebrew, English and French and this taught me a kind of discipline that some actors are lacking today," said Dubin, who added that her Hebrew name is Elana, which means tree – a title that fits her tall, 5-foot-10 frame.

Although she just finished a movie- of-the-week that was filmed in Ottawa called Murder in My House, in which she played the lead's best friend, she seemed more excited about her role as Jeri Slate in The Collector, which is set to begin it's third season on CityTV.

"I play a dedicated, passionate journalist who'll do anything to get a story," she said.

"She's a ballsy, fast-talking broad," she added.

Her character also has an autistic son who may have ties with the devil and has a prophetic ability to predict what will happen in the future.

"She's a really intriguing character," said Dubin, who likens her character's relationship with her co-star Chris Kramer, to that of Fox Mulder and Dana Scully of the The X files.

"It's sexy in an intellectual way."

As for her role in the cult hit Napolean Dynamite, she said while she doesn't get stopped in the streets, when people do find out that she played Ilene, they spit all her lines back at her.

"This movie was huge for me. It helped my career immensely. When I did this movie I could never have imagined this kind of response," she said, commenting on the fact that dolls and T-shirts displaying lines from the movie are flying off the shelves at stores like Target.

As much as she enjoys playing comedic roles, she said she'd love the opportunity to "tackle great Shakespearean roles like Isabella, Cleopatra and Lady Macbeth," but off stage, quirky, off-beat characters appeal to her.

"I love roles that are slightly off. The ones that are comedic and dramatic at the same time."

She said she would love to land a role on a show like Six Feet Under, or Law and Order.

"I like to play strong women. They've got to have some substance to them."

Her plan, now that she has played almost every role imaginable, is to continue to act and read scripts to find characters she'd like to play, but she'd also love to produce a film herself.

"I have no desire to direct, but I would love to put a film together."

She explained that because she appreciates the hard work of the many people she works with, she would love to be able to give back to them.

Despite her success, Dubin has managed to stay grounded, and discussed her plans to fly to Toronto from her home in Los Angeles to spend the High Holy Days with her family.

"Family is number one to me."

PUBLISHERS PRODUCE MORE HOLOCAUST TALES FOR YOUNG READERS

Toronto author Karen Levine's phenomenally popular Holocaust tale, Hana's Suitcase, has sold more than a quarter million copies internationally since its publication by Second Story Press in 2002. Two more books in Second Story's Holocaust Remembrance Series for Young Readers, The Secret of Gabi's Dresser and Clara's War, have also done remarkably well, having gone into five and three printings respectively.

The latest title in the series is The Righteous Smuggler by Debbie Spring, which chronicles the story of some Righteous Gentiles who courageously opposed the Nazis to save lives. (Spring is scheduled to speak at the Jewish Book Fair, Nov. 9, 1:30 p.m.)

The series' success may have enticed other Canadian publishers into presenting Holocaust tales for young readers. Another recent addition to the genre is Dear Canada: Turned Away, The World War Diary of Devorah Bernstein by Carol Matas. The book tells the tale of 5,000 Jewish children in wartime France who were shipped to Auschwitz because Canada and other countries were in no hurry to accept them, even though they had visas. The publisher is Scholastic Canada.

Jew in the Lotus: Toronto's first Tibetan Film Festival includes a screening of The Jew in the Lotus, the 1998 documentary by Laurel Chiten, as part of a Spirituality in Exile evening with guest commentator Evan Solomon and Thupten Jinpa, former translator for the Dalai Lama. Both appear in Serenity, a new Universal film by writer-director Joss Whedon, based on the television series Firefly. Halfway through production, Whedon informed the twins that he had rewritten the script to expand their roles. The Feldman twins are also developing a sitcom, Half Life, based on their lives as twins.

The spiritual odyssey of a German soldier who became a Jew

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

He was born in Germany, grew up under the shadow of Nazism, joined the Luftwaffe, visited Israel, studied Hebrew, converted to Judaism, adopted a new name, married a Jew and settled down in Jerusalem as a tourist guide.

Too fantastic to be true?

Truth can indeed be stranger than fiction.

This was the trajectory of Oskar Eder's life, and now a captivating book about his amazing odyssey, Pilgrimage From Darkness: Nuremberg To Jerusalem (University Press of Mississippi), has been written by David Feldman.

Asher Eder

Born in Lauf, a town in northern Bavaria, Eder was a product of his times and milieu.

As a child, he was told by a Catholic priest that Jews were destined to suffer because they had murdered Jesus. And as an adolescent, he heard that "parasitical" Jews were debasing Germany's culture.

Eder did not pick up these prejudices from his parents, who were anti-Nazi socialists who believed that Adolf Hitler's barbaric regime would be short-lived.

Yet Eder, having absorbed the anti-Semitism propagated by the Nazis, was a true believer.

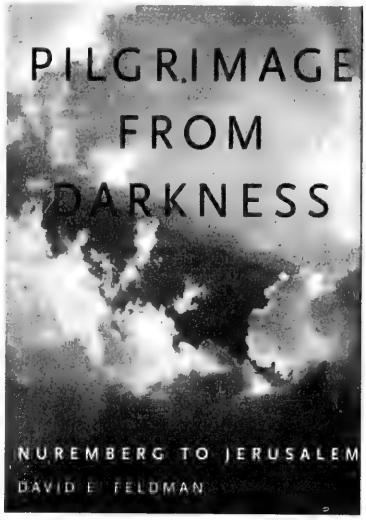
When Kristallnacht descended on German Jews in 1938, his mother said that the infamous pogrom had been orchestrated by the government. Being completetly brainwashed, he thought she was lying.

Eder also challenged his mother's hostile view of Germany's dismemberment of Czechoslovakia, claiming it was justified.

In 1943, when he was 18, Eder was inducted into the Luftwaffe. Having completed his flight training, he was assigned to a base in Bohemia.

There he met Heinz, a dissident who would have a lasting influence on him. Heinz, a philosopher, argued that Germany had strayed down an aberrant path in embracing Hitler.

Heinz's belief that Nazism was a stain on Germany unsettled Eder, but it took a horrifying sight in a train station to finally convince him that the new order imperilled Germany's future.



As he walked to his train, he saw a German army officer dangling from a rope, his uniform covered with a placard that read: "I am hanging here because I declared that the war will be lost."

It was a "watershed moment" in Eder's life, his ineradicable break with Nazism, Feldman writes.

Interned by the Americans after Germany's defeat, Eder was promptly released when his interrogator concluded he had not been a war criminal.

Returning home, he was fortunate to find a job as a day labourer repairing a railway line. Shortly afterward, his father came back from the Russian front, a broken old man in a tattered uniform.

In postwar Germany, Eder studied law at a university in Erlangen. But as a lawyer for a bank in Frankfurt, he felt spiritually empty.

Looking eastward for sustenance, he travelled to India, where he was invited to join an ashram. Continuing his travels on the sub-continent, Eder studied Islam. Then, in Cochin, the home of an ancient Jewish community, he discovered Judaism.

Eder visited Israel in 1957, crossing into western Jerusalem through a militrary checkpoint popularly known as the Mandelbam Gate.

To his surprise, he encounted no discernible hostility when he identified himself as a German.

Through a friend, Eder met a Hebrew University philosophy professor with whom he discussed Judaism and the beauty of the sabbath rituals. This man introduced Eder to Martin Buber, the great German-born philosopher.

Eder, who liked Jerusalem enormously, became increasingly attached to Israel. After a while, he found work on a kibbutz on the shores of the Sea of Galilee.

On Kibbutz Hazarea, where he changed his first name to Asher, he enrolled at an ulpan. The Hebrew classes were difficult, but they enabled him to develop his interest in biblical studies.

Eder made friends on the kibbutz. They encouraged him to stay in Israel, but he took a job at a children's orphanage that had been founded in Berlin. Then he worked as a farmer, planting trees on hillsides.

Having decided to be a Jew, Eder had himself circumcised. The brit was performed in 1968 in Tel Aviv by a doctor whose family had been murdered during the Holocaust. Shortly afterward, he was officially converted to Judaism.

Before his conversion, he discussed the matter with his parents.

His mother was shocked by his decision to leave Christianity. "You can't become a Jew," she said.

"What do you think Jesus was," he countered. She embraced Eder, kissed him on the forehead and said, "You're right."

His father, however, accepted his pending conversion with equanimity, according to Feldman. He said, "Your religion is not my concern. You'll always be my son. Stay honest and straightforward, the way you've always been."

Not along after his conversion, in an ironic turn of events, Eder wed Naomi, a Holocaust survivor. The couple settled down in Jerusalem.

In 1969, Eder segued into academic work, producing a pamphlet titled The Sayings of the Quran on the Arab-Israeli Controversy.

An expanded version was published under the title of Peace is Possible Between Ishmael and Israel According to the Quran and the Tanakh.

Two years later, he passed a course for tour guides, and today, he shepherds tourists around Israel.

He was too old to be a soldier in the 1973 Yom Kippur War, but he volunteered to transport soldiers and ferry supplies in his Volkswagen minibus.

In 1996, he and a Muslim cleric of Italian origin, Abdul Hadi Palazzi, founded the Islam-Israel Friendship Fellowship. Peace between Israel and the Muslim world is still far off, but that does not deter Eder.

Eder's amazing life is proof of the aphorism that nothing in this crazy world is carved in stone or is immutable.

Children rebel against religion to 'get their parents'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Family conflicts about religious practice or philosophy may not actually be about religion at all, speakers at a recent Torah in Motion program at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation said.

Rabbi Shmuel Veffer, associate rabbi at the Village Shul and a senior lecturer at Aish HaTorah, said that in his experience, religious conflict in a family is always a symptom of something different.

"Torah is a magnifying glass, highlighting the relationship between parents and their children – whether good or bad."

This applies, he said, whether the parents are observant and the children are not; the children are observant and the parents are not; or there is division between the parents about observance, or any other set of circumstances.

Parents must realize, Rabbi Veffer said, that for their children, becoming an adult means changing from a dependent person to one who is independent. It is natural, then, for children, when seeking to be independent, to rebel against what is important to their parents, "whether it's religion or putting hospital corners on their beds." And religion, to most people, is a matter of serious consequence, he added.

Parents confuse a natural expression of becoming an individual with hostility toward religion, he said. "They rebel because they know that's what will get their parents."

Parents need patience, Rabbi Veffer said. "If a teenager feels accepted, feels loved and supported, and the parents keep the lines of communication open, issues usually get resolved just by the child growing up."

Realize, he said, that if you want to influence your child, don't worry about what he is doing – worry about what you are doing. Be a model of the kind of person you want him to be, with the kind of behaviours and values you want for him, Rabbi Veffer advised.

Norman Blumenthal, a clinical psychologist specializing in adolescent and group therapy, said that the need to be a distinct individual reaches a crescendo in adolescence. Ironically, when children grow up, they are usually pretty similar to their parents.

Rebellion, Blumenthal said, is often "a statement about your inconsistency and double standards" in how you lead your life. Children pick up, for instance, on a parent's leaving Shabbat services to debate the merits of different kinds of Scotch at the kiddush club. "Obviously, Scotch is more important than davening."

Conflict can escalate when either the husband or the wife become more or less observant than the other one. "There can be resentment, sarcasm, one parent encouraging the children to rebel as they wish they could," Blumenthal said.

When a child has an exceptional parent or sibling, he or she may feel that they can't possibly measure up. Becoming more or less religious can be one of the few ways he can stand out in the family, Blumenthal said.

Religion, he said, can be a radical weapon, a form of anger and defiance no different than smoking pot would be.

If a person's need to be a distinct individual is handled properly, it can lead to a person who is strong and creative.

Blumenthal cited the story of Natan Sharansky, who endured years of imprisonment and mistreatment in the Soviet Union, until he was allowed to leave. "When he was told to go straight across a bridge to where he would be received by his wife and western officials, he zig-zagged across, as a last act of defiance."

So how do you cope with conflict in the family over religion?

"It's vital to be consistent. You can't steal, and expect your kid not to; you can't wander in late to shul and then criticize your kid for doing the same thing."

This applies equally to relations with your spouse, your children's school and your shul, Blumenthal said. This doesn't mean that there isn't room for individual thought, he added, so long as it is treated with respect.

Whatever you observe, he said, "do it with passion, joy and excitement." The great scholar Rabbi Moshe Feinstein attributed people leaving religious observance to the phrase that was ubiquitous in previous days, "Sis shver tsu zein a Yid" – it's hard to be a Jew.

A parent has to allow a certain amount of individuality in a child. "Pick your battles," he advised. If, for instance, you wear a kippah srugah (the knitted kippah worn by religious Zionists), don't freak out if your child decides to wear a black hat.

"The more tolerant and respectful you are, the more likely it will be that your kids will follow your path," he said.

In the same vein, the last thing you should worry about, if your child takes a different religious path, is what the neighbours will say. "Do what's right for your kid," he insisted.

Calendar highlights strength, beauty of women athletes

By RICHARD ASINOF
JTA

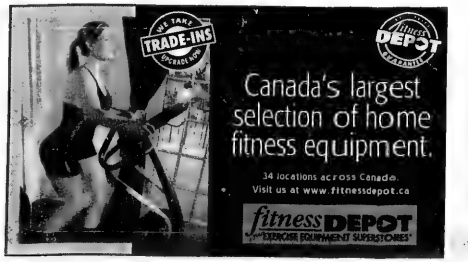
BOSTON — What does a hockey goalie, a pole-vaulter, two fencers, a marathoner and a kayaker have to do with the coming Jewish New Year?

They are female Jewish athletes whose images grace a new calendar for the year 5766. Titled Jewish + Female = Athlete: Portraits of Strength from around the World, the calendar is produced by the Hadassah-Brandeis Institute and celebrates 14 current sports stars and 13 legends from the past.

"Jewish girls deserve to grow up knowing that strength is beauty," said Shulamit Reinharz, the founding director of the Hadassah-Brandeis Institute. "Jewish children of both genders should look at these amazing athletes as role models."

The calendar – and a larger-than-life, free-standing travelling exhibit available to schools, synagogues, libraries and community centres – was officially launched at a Sept. 18 celebration at Brandeis University.

Daniela Yael Krakower, a two time Olympian, is Argentina's first judo world champion (2003).



The calendar celebrates contemporary Jewish female athletes from around the world, and pays tribute to the stories of Jewish female athletes who were pioneers in breaking down barriers.

For instance, the month of April, corresponding in the Hebrew calendar to Nisan-Iyar, highlights Israel's professional tennis star, Anna Smashnova.

It also details the "herstory" of Angela Buxton, the only Jewish woman to win at Wimbledon.

Buxton overcame pervasive anti-Semitism in the tennis world. She teamed with the black player Althea Gibson to win the women's doubles championships at Wimbledon and the French Open in 1956. Buxton went on to become co-founder of the Israel Tennis Centers.

The "cover girls" for the calendar are Sada and Emily Jacobson, sisters and sabre fencers from Atlanta, Ga., who both competed in the 2004 Olympic Games. Sada won a bronze medal at the Games and each has won an NCAA championship. In the photograph the two sisters are shown fencing in an open field.

"You can't win just by being the strongest and the fastest. You also have to be the smartest," said Emily Jacobson, in a quote accompanying the picture.

A senior at Yale University, Sada said it was a "big honour" to be on the cover on the calendar.

She said fencing "is a great sport because it incorporates the physical with the intellectual." She and her sister, she continued, are extremely competitive. "When we fence each other, it's all business. We go to win.

"But when the bout is over, we're back to being sisters. We cheer each other on and try to help however possible," she said.

All of the women were chosen for their athletic prowess and their pride in their Jewish identity, according to Reinharz. The decision to focus on Jewish female athletes is credited to Nathalie Alyon, who worked for the Hadassah-Brandeis Institute.

"We hope to help expand the understanding of Jewish women's lives, interests and accomplishments and encourage the Jewish community to rethink traditional gender definitions," Reinharz said.

This year's calendar is the latest in a series produced by the Hadassah-Brandeis Institute to create a new image of Jewish women in the Jewish and non-Jewish communities. A previous calendar featured female rabbis from around the world.

"What's the typical image of a Jew?" Reinharz asked rhetorically. "All too often, it's of a bearded older man praying or blowing the shofar."

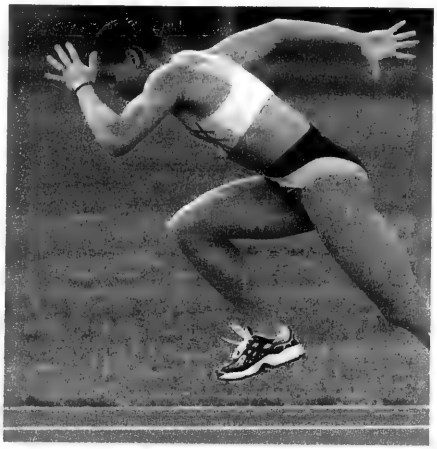
The images of female athletes portrayed in the calendar provide a sharp contrast with that stereotype. Among the featured athletes are Zhanna Pintusevich-Block, a sprinter from Ukraine, shown in mid-stride, arms pumping, and Jillian Schwartz, a pole-vaulter from the United States, soaring over the bar with nothing but blue sky above her muscular body.

"When we're looking at these women, we're looking at their bodies, for sure," said Reinharz. "It's also important for us that you look beyond the picture and see people who have accomplished so much, as humans who have a history, using their minds to figure out what's required to achieve success, using their emotions to go the extra mile."

For Linda Borish, an associate professor of history at Western Michigan University, the calendar represents an opportunity to share her original research on the history of Jewish women in American sports. Her odyssey began in 1999 when she was asked to review a book on Jewish men in American sports for American Jewish History, the official publication of the American Jewish Historical Society.

"I wondered," she said, "why there was no inclusion or record of Jewish women athletes. Was it because women did not participate or play, or was it because the author didn't look."

What Borish found was that Jewish women not only played but were often leaders in their sports. To her, the Jewish + Female = Athlete calendar adds to the historical record about Jewish women seeking opportunities in sport and society.



Zhanna Pintusevich-Block, a native of Nezin, Ukraine, was world champion in the 200-metres (1997) and 100-metres (2001).

One of the most compelling stories, according to Borish, is that of Charlotte "Eppy" Epstein, who founded the famed New York Women's Swimming Association and led the way for the recognition of women's swimming as an Olympic sport in 1920. Her swimming champions, known as "Eppy swimmers," set 51 world records and won 30 national relay championships.

"Many people know the story of Jewish athlete Marty Glickman, a sprinter, being denied the opportunity to race at the 1936 Olympics in Berlin," Borish said. "In 1936, Eppy resigned as assistant manager of the U.S. Women's Olympic Swim Team and from the U.S. Olympic Committee in protest of Nazi Germany's persecution of Jews."

Now, says Borish, the story of Epstein and other Jewish female athletes are being rediscovered "For the first time," Borish said, "the new edition of Encyclopaedia Judaica will have entries about Jewish women and sports," based on her research. "I'm waiting for when there are trading cards for Jewish women athletes," she said.

The only Canadian athlete mentioned in the calendar is Fanny "Bobbie" Rosenfeld, a multi-sport star in the 1920s who was named Canada's Female Athlete of the Half Century in 1950.

In addition to being available in Judaica stores, the calendar can be ordered online at www.brandeis.edu/hbi or by phone at (781) 736-8114.

Maccabi Elite Tel Aviv won back-to-back Euroleague Championships in 2004-2005 and 2003-2004. The team's 90-78 win over Tau Vitoria on May 8, 2005, brought the European Cup to Tel Aviv for the fifth time – the third time in the last five years. To return or not return a misbegotten gift

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman, C.A.

Judaism abhors outright hypocrisy. Therefore, a mitzvah performed as a direct result of a transgression, mitzvah haba b'aveirah, loses its value. Thus the Mishnah teaches that a stolen lulav may not be used. It would be quite incongruous to thank God with stolen goods. To emphasize the point, and perhaps point to its pervasiveness, the Mishnah specifically disqualifies a stolen hadas, arava and etrog. While there are few who would actually steal a lulav, there are perhaps many more who may not pay the applicable taxes or custom duties.

The recent guilty plea of David Radler, former chief operating officer of Hollinger International, to mail fraud has brought these issues to the forefront. Queen's University, to which Radler donated $1 million, decided not only to strip his name from a wing of its business school but to return his donation.

Is such an approach necessary?

Recently, a group of U.S. investors initiated a lawsuit against Ridley College in St. Catharines, Ont., alleging that a gift made to the school in 1998 came from monies from which they were cheated. The suit claims that the school "had knowledge of circumstances which would have led a reasonable person to inquire about the source of funds," something the college claims it had no duty to do.

It's quite clear that no one has a right to give charity with money that is not rightfully theirs. Underreporting your income and then donating the resulting tax savings would constitute theft, and the government would be well within its right to recover that money. Similarly, shareholders may demand that a CEO stop making large corporate gifts without their approval, because he is not using his own money to do so.

The Shulchan Aruch states that when collecting large sums of money, you must ensure that it actually belongs to the person making the donation. The case discussed involves a woman with no apparent source of income who was making large gifts – the onus is on the charity to ensure she was not donating stolen funds. This ruling would seem to indicate that without a reasonable basis for suspicion, a charity may accept donated funds without further investigation.

The fact someone earned some income illegally does not void donations made from his legitimate earnings. Furthermore, money donated before a person had committed fraud would not be recoverable. Absent direct linkage between a particular transaction and a particular donation, we have to assume that the inappropriate donation would be proportionate to his total income. Thus, if a person's income is $1 million, with $100,000 of it earned illegally, then 10 per cent of a donation can be assumed to be illegitimate. Thus, returning the full amount of the Radler gift appears to be unnecessary. Nonetheless, the money to be returned must not go to the donor, but to those who were defrauded.

The issue of "naming rights" is one in which perception is crucial. Jewish ethics teaches that one should do mitzvot for their own sake, not for recognition. However, as recipients must express gratitude to people who help them, in practice, it's appropriate to put up a plaque acknowledging a donation. And since people like to see their name acknowledged, one should prominently display such plaques. The goal is to raise more money, and honouring past donors helps bring in future ones.

With public displays, in essence, being a tool for inducing further gifts, it would appear that recognizing someone of questionable moral character is likely to have the opposite effect, thus removing such a person's name is the appropriate approach. In addition to these pragmatic considerations, a charity must be careful lest it appear that money is more important than morality.

Sukkot and thatched huts

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

The simple wooden room – the sukkah – symbolizes temporary housing used by wandering Jews in the desert following the Exodus from Egypt.

It is designed to be erected and torn down within weeks, and acts as a reminder of that lengthy Jewish trek and some of the hardships they endured; that we were once transient, strangers in a strange land lugging portable havens from sand hill to sand hill. The sukkah is a cheaply built habitation that also highlights the contrast between our comfortable daily residences today and the makeshift existence of our Jewish ancestors.

A Jew is instructed to eat, drink and sleep in the sukkah – to dwell in it. Together with the shaking of the lulav and the smelling of the etrog, Sukkot is a holiday that leads us outside of our drywall surroundings, exposing us to the elements and the frailty of life without the protections of bricks and mortars.

I've often wondered how Jews who lived in abject poverty, like the shtetl Jews of eastern Europe or the impoverished Jews of northern Africa, whose actual lodgings might be pieced together with wire and glue, would design their sukkah. How different could the two have been?

Some Jews truly delight in the mitzvah of eating and sleeping in a wobbly sukkah, impervious to the pestering bees drawn to the honey drips on the spotted sukkah table. They welcome neighbourhood guests, along with the spirits of the patriarchs and matriarchs, into this rough and ready shelter, thrilled to actualize this earthy and outdoorsy Jewish tradition.

Today, living in a community that has amassed much wealth and success, the message of the sukkah might also extend outside of our own particular experiences and history to remind us as well of the poor souls throughout the globe, who still live in sukkah-like abodes.

Perhaps, when we sit around the cramped sukkah table, feasting on holiday delights, we should also speak about the diminutive cages thousands of migrants use as homes in urban China; the cardboard condominiums constructed under the Bloor Viaduct by those we call homeless – Toronto's very own Bedouins; individuals, called the People of the Dead, who live in cemeteries in places such as Alexandria, Egypt, where ancient tombstones keep their shanty homes upright; poor villagers around the world whose thatched huts frequently blow over when a strapping wind visits their village, as those in Sri Lanka during the tsunami; and the weak and pathetic tent cities created in New Orleans following Hurricane Katrina.

Sukhot is a yom tov with extensive ritual and focus on the meaning and importance of "home." Through the construction of this quirky shelter, we are compelled to investigate the universal human drive to build one, regardless of the available tools and materials – sometimes tombstones and other times twigs and mud.

When we feast in the sukkah in 5766 and chant the brachah: Baruch A'to… melech olam, asher kidshanu b'mitzvotav v'itzivanu l'aishav b'sukhah. Blessed is the Lord our God, Ruler of the universe, who has hallowed us with his mitzvot and commands us to reside in a sukkah, let us remember how fortunate most of us are in this community to have a place that will stand firm through thunderous storms, gale-force winds and protect us from the blazing sun of the noon hour and the lurking dangers of the night.

On Sukkot 5766, let us also consider those sukkot that exist in our times, that stand 365 days of the year for millions who are still strangers in their strange lands and homeless in a world with plenty.

REGIONAL JEWISH COMMUNITIES OF ONTARIO

On behalf of the 27 communities that make up the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (RJCO), I am honoured that we are participating in this year's 25th Annual Holocaust Education Week activities. Once again, we are offering a variety of programs in our communities, ensuring that the lessons of the Shoah continue to be taught to future generations.

I want to thank the members of the Holocaust Education Week Committee, the Holocaust Centre of Toronto and our many community leaders and volunteers who work so passionately to ensure each one of our events is a success. I congratulate and thank our RJCO staff, especially Carson Phillips, who works throughout the year to ensure high calibre programming is available to our communities.

As we continue to learn about and reflect on the tragedy of the Holocaust, we also have the opportunity to promote values of respect and acceptance that affect our lives today. We shall continue to renew our dedication to Holocaust Education and promote an environment that is safe and rewarding for all Canadians.

In this our 25th anniversary of Holocaust Education Weeks, the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of Christian Jewish Dialogue of Toronto has again worked with churches of all denominations to bring educational programs to the non-Jewish community in Toronto and surrounding areas.

Our mandate is to reach out and, again, it has been a very positive experience, especially with many clergy saying "yes" for the first time. The programs are varied – films, survivor speakers – aimed at people of all ages. Special note should be made that just prior to our opening program, members of the congregation of Our Lady of Lourdes Roman Catholic Church will visit the Holocaust Centre, fulfilling their mandate to reach out to the survivors and those who did not survive. We trust that those who attend the programs will come away with a feeling of kinship and understanding.

WEAPONS OF THE SPIRIT: LE CHAMBON-SUR-LIGNON

A CONSPIRACY OF GOODNESS

Le Chambon-sur-Lignon is a tiny Protestant farming village in the mountains of south-central France. From 1940-1944, defying the Nazis and French government collaborators, the villagers provided a safe haven for 5,000 Jews in grave danger. Most of the villagers, proud descendants of the Huguenots, the first Protestants in Catholic France, remembered their own history of persecution. Deeply religious, they tried to heed the Biblical admonition to love your neighbour as yourself.

The day after France surrendered to Nazi Germany, their pastor, André Trocmé, reminded them that "the responsibility of Christians is to resist the violence that will be brought to bear on their consciences through the weapons of the spirit."

PIERRE SAUVAGE, born in Le Chambon and a child survivor of the Holocaust, is an Emmy Award winning filmmaker and founder of the non profit Chambon Foundation. He will illustrate his talk with excerpts from his documentary Weapons of the Spirit. HELPING THE HELPLESS: SURVIVAL IN THE NAZI ERA

What are the circumstances that prompt some people to help others? SISTER RENATE SEEBASS, an Anglican nun from the Convent of the Holy Name in Derby, England, will shed light on the story of why one German family risked their lives to help strangers.

In April 1945, two young Jewish men fled the Langenstein-Zwieberge concentration camp, a Buchenwald sub-camp, just as the SS was rounding up prisoners to be shot. Adolph Weissmark and Rudolph Klepfisz stumbled upon Pastor Julius Seebass's home. Despite the risk to their own lives, the family took the men in. The Pastor's wife and children, Renate, Ricarda, Stephan and Johannes, nursed the young Holocaust survivors back to health. Ricarda subsequently died of typhus contracted from the escapees. Renate was so moved by the rescue that, shortly after the War, she moved to England where she became an Anglican nun.

PROFESSOR MONA SUE WEISSMARK grew up in Forest Hills, New York, with no other relatives besides her immediate family. She has strung this story together through bits and pieces of information from her father, Adolph, about his experience. Professor Weissmark will present a brief video about this heartwarming story and will be available to sign her book Justice Matters.

Sixty years later, Israel's Yad Vashem Commission for the Designation of the Righteous named the late Pastor, his late wife, Hertha, and their children "Righteous Among the Nations," an honour bestowed upon non-Jews who risked their lives rescuing Jews during the Holocaust. Sister Renate will discuss her experience and help us understand why some people retain their human compassion even as others let go of theirs.

For Jews desperate to leave Nazi Germany, the International Settlement in Shanghai offered a safe haven. Although the area was occupied by Japan, an imperialist nation friendly towards Germany, the influx of Jews was not curtailed. As a result, about 22,000 Jewish refugees settled there, joining the 7,200 Sephardi and Russian Jews already residing there. Among those who made their way to Shanghai was three-year-old HANNELORE HEINEMANN HEADLEY and her parents. The title of her book refers to the colour of her hair, unusual in China. THE POWER OF LANGUAGE – HOW WE TALK ABOUT THE HOLOCAUST

Language frames the terms by which we think about events, portray them, interpret them, and give them meaning. The use of language, with its complexities and nuances, can significantly influence how events are perceived and understood. How does the media depict atrocities such as the Holocaust? Is there an element of "sanitization" when describing the Holocaust? If so, why? Can adequate language be found to convey the horror of such a tragedy?

These and other issues relating to the use of words will be explored by the following panel, moderated by well-known CBC broadcaster MICHAEL ENRIGHT.

PROFESSOR SARA HOROWITZ, Director of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University and Professor of Comparative Literature in the Division of Humanities. She is the author of Voicing the Void: Muteness and Memory in Holocaust Fiction and has published extensively on Holocaust literature, women survivors and Jewish American fiction.

ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR PAUL KNOX, Chair of the Ryerson University School of Journalism, and a Director of Canadian Journalists for Free Expression, a non-profit organization dedicated to protecting journalists and promoting freedom of expression in Canada and around the world. He is a former reporter and editor for The Globe and Mail, specializing in international affairs.

URSULA DUBA, prose poet (Tales from a Child of the Enemy), writer and lecturer, grew up in the impenetrable silence of post-War Germany. Today she focuses almost exclusively on the legacy of the Shoah and the Nazi regime.

THE SEPHARDI EXPERIENCE OF THE HOLOCAUST

MEHMET ULKUMEN is Chief of Protocol of the Protocol and Liaison Service of the United Nations office in Geneva. He is the son of Selahattin Ulkumen, who rescued 37 Jewish families when the Nazis took control of Rhodes, Greece in 1944. When the Jews of Rhodes were rounded up, the elder Ulkumen, then Turkish consul, insisted that, according to a treaty between Turkey and Germany, Turkish Jews and their spouses could not be deported. The Nazis gave in to his demands but likely in retaliation, German planes bombed the Turkish consulate, mortally wounding Selahattin's pregnant wife, who gave birth to their son Mehmet just before dying. Mehmet struggled for years with the tragic outcome of his father's actions. His father became the first non Christian to receive the Righteous Among the Nations award.

How could the most influential newspaper in the U.S. at the time, the venerable The New York Times, under-estimate and under report the mass killing of more than 6,000,000 Jews? PROFESSOR LAUREL LEFF will present an in depth look at how the newspaper failed in its coverage of the fate of European Jews from 1939-1945. She will examine how the decisions that were made at the newspaper ultimately resulted in the minimizing and misunderstanding of modern history's worst genocide. She will recount how personal relationships at the newspaper, the assimilationist tendencies of the Jewish owner, and the ethos of mid-century America all led the newspaper to consistently downplay news of the Holocaust, as well as explore how news of Hitler's "Final Solution" was hidden from readers and because of the newspaper's influence on other media - from America at large.

WHAT WE CAN DO: TAKING ACTION IN THE FACE OF GENOCIDE

During Holocaust Education Week, as we focus our attention on the Holocaust, we wonder how the world could have been so silent in the face of such horrors.

The words "Never Again" are on our lips. This program is presented for those looking for ways to stand behind those words, to take action against genocide going on in our own time. We will hear from multifaith and Sudanese community activists who are working to halt contemporary genocides, such as that going on in Dartur, and gather ideas on how we can take meaningful action.

Speakers include AVRUM ROSENSWEIG, Director of Ve'ahavta, DR. NORMAN EPSTEIN, founder and Co-chair of Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan (C.A.S.T.S.), and DR. DOCTORS FROM HELL

At the age of 21, VIVIEN SPITZ was [illegible] court reporter at the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials, where she documented over 300,000 pages of testimony of the actions of 23 doctors who tortured and killed by experiments they authorized in the name of patriotism and scientific research. This landmark trial resulted in the establishment of the Nuremberg Code, which sets the guidelines for medical research. Ms. Spitz went on to become the first woman court reporter for the U.S. Senate, and has taken down the words of four American Presidents.

The pervasive lies of Holocaust deniers spurred her to become a passionate activist, to date speaking out to over 45,000 people worldwide. She has been honoured numerous times for her work, with President Clinton paying her special tribute for receiving "the first NCRA Humanitarian Award in recognition of her service as a court reporter during the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials and her dedicated efforts to promote Holocaust remembrance." Following her talk, she will be available to sign her new book, Doctors from Hell: The Horrific Account of Nazi Experiments on Humans.

CONTINUING THE LEGACY: REMEMBERING THE PAST

The March of the Living program educates about the horrors of the Holocaust and its results to thousands of high school students from all over the world who will, hopefully, teach this lesson to future generations. They visit Poland, where participants witness evidence of Hitler's "Final Solution." The students then travel to Israel where they experience entirely different emotions. After returning from this life altering trip, JAIME REICH and CALLY SCHWARTZ, two young members of Temple Kol Ami, will discuss their own experiences, describe the impact the March had on them and illustrate their trip with a brief video. Holocaust survivor MIKE ENGLISHMAN, who participated in the same trip, will discuss it from his perspective. Mike was born in Amsterdam, Netherlands. His entire immediate family and first wife perished in the camps. Mike survived five concentration camps and two prisons and came to Canada in 1952 with his new family and soon became involved in combating Neo-Nazis in Toronto. He has received honour and recognition from the Government of Canada for the work he does educating the general public. A question & answer period will follow. Of interest to the whole family.

THE LOST WOODEN SYNAGOGUES OF EASTERN EUROPE

For hundreds of years, the Jews of Eastern Europe built their houses of worship out of wood in the rural communities. With the Holocaust came the destruction of these wooden synagogues. Of the more than a thousand structures that existed before WW II, only a handful remain today. All are boarded up and abandoned.

ALBERT BARRY, executive producer of the multiple award-winning documentary, The Lost Wooden Synagogues of Eastern Europe, will tell the story of these synagogues, the life that surrounded them before the War and what happened to them in the last 60 years. He has researched and collected rare photographs of these synagogues for the past 40 years, has built scale models of these structures and has donated them to The Judaica Collection at Florida Atlantic University Libraries in Boca Raton, Florida, where they are on permanent display.

STRUMA

To escape the massacres in Romania in 1941, 778 Romanian and Russian Jews embarked on a vessel in Constanza, bound for Palestine. On February 23, 1942, Turkish police seized control of the Struma and towed it into the Black Sea. The following day, a Russian submarine sank her with a single torpedo, killing all, but one, aboard. Among the victims was the grandfather of Greg Buxton. Buxton later led an expedition to locate the wreck and to commemorate those lost. A documentary, produced by Simcha Jacobovici and associate director Felix Golubev, will tell this story.

JOE LEINBURD will lead a discussion following the screening. He was born in 1922 in Suceava (Bucovina), Romania. When the Romanian Fascist Regime, collaborating with Germany, deported the Jewish community of Northern Bucovina to Transnistria, Joe and his family survived the torturous forced march. He went back to Romania in 1944 and lived in Displaced Persons camps before coming to Canada with his wife in 1949.

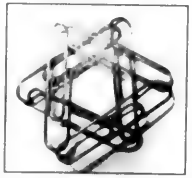
PAPER CLIPS



It began as a lesson about prejudice – what happened next was a miracle. In 1998, the students of Whitwell Middle School in rural Tennessee embarked on a classroom project aimed at teaching about cultural diversity in a small community, almost exclusively white and Christian. The school's principal, Linda Hooper, created "Paper Clips" to help her students grasp the enormity of human suffering during the Holocaust. The idea was to collect six million paper clips – one for each of the six million Jewish victims of the Holocaust – an idea that touched a chord among Holocaust survivors, their families and even world leaders and celebrities. The students eventually amassed millions of paper clips, from around the world. President George W. Bush, former President Bill Clinton, and many German citizens as well as thousands of others from 29 countries and 49 states. This film, produced in 2003, takes viewers from the initial stages of the project through to its fruition.

The program will conclude with a panel discussion that focuses on challenges faced by Toronto educators to help their students develop an understanding of issues relating to anti-Semitism and racism. KAREN MURTON, Principal of Branksome Hall and HAL HANNAFORD, Headmaster of Royal St. George's College, will discuss how they helped their students deal with an anti-Semitic incident. LEN RUDNER, National Director of Community Relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, will discuss ways in which students can be encouraged to make ethical choices.

BEING JEWISH IN THE NEW GERMANY

Germany today boasts the fastest growing population of Jews in Europe. The streets of Berlin abound with signs of a revival of Jewish culture, ranging from bagel shops to the sight of worshippers leaving synagogue on Saturday. In this surprising description of the rebirth of a community, PROFESSOR JEFFREY PECK argues that there is, indeed, a vibrant and significant future for Jews in Germany. He also explores new forms of anti-Semitism and relations between Jews and Turks, the country's other prominent minority population. UNKNOWN ITALIAN HEROES: RESISTANCE AND RESCUE IN ITALY

BIANCA SCHLESINGER was eight years old when her family had to flee Croatia due to the Nazi invasion, seeking refuge in nearby Italy. While it may seem a paradox that Jews were seeking refuge in a country allied with Nazi Germany, the Italian people were not anti-Semitic and did not cooperate with the persecutions. In September 1943, when the Germans invaded Italy, Bianca was hidden and saved by Italian villagers. After the War, she immigrated with her family to Israel.

Bianca's cousin, ESTHER BEM, a survivor speaker at The Holocaust Centre of Toronto, was raised in Zagreb. During the War, she and her parents survived by hiding in Italy, where poor farmers helped them. Esther and her family arrived in Canada in 1966.

FATHER MARCO BAGNAROL was ordained as a Priest in 1993. He worked in Uganda as a missionary between 1996-1998 and then in Portugal between 1998-2004. He has translated two books from Italian to English about the Holocaust and is presently translating the memoirs of the former Chief Rabbi of Rome.

WE REMEMBER AND HONOUR

An evening commemorating Kristallnacht, honouring the Survivors and paying tribute to the Liberators

GERDA WEISSMANN KLEIN was living a happy childhood in Bielsko, Poland when German soldiers invaded in September 1939. Within months her brother, Artur, was taken away and the family was ordered into ghetto quarters. In 1942, she was separated from her parents and forced into slave labour.

Three years later, she was one of 200 slave girls remaining from the 4,000 who were forced on a 1,000-mile winter death march, which ended in the Czech town of Volary. Among the Americans who liberated them was a Jewish lieutenant named Kurt Klein. He and Gerda would eventually marry and begin a new life together.

A recipient of many awards, including seven honorary doctorates, she has appeared frequently on TV. She is the author of several books, including her autobiography All But My Life, and her most recent A Boring Evening At Home. A documentary film about her experiences, One Survivor Remembers, won an Academy Award in 1996. Speaking at the Oscar ceremony, she expressed the belief that the most treasured place on earth is home and that during her years of suffering, she longed to spend a "boring evening at home" with her family.

Gerda Klein will speak about her experiences during and after the Holocaust, as well as the work of The Gerda and Kurt Klein Foundation, founded to promote tolerance, lessen prejudice and encourage community service focused on hunger relief.

THE HONOURABLE BARNETT (BARNEY) DANSON will also participate. A native Torontonian, he enlisted as a rifleman in the Queen's Own Rifles of Canada at the age of 18 and was later wounded during combat in Normandy.

In 1968, Mr. Danson was elected to the House of Commons as the Liberal Member of Parliament for North York and subsequently held two Cabinet positions. He retired from politics in 1979 and, in 1996, was named an Officer of the Order of Canada.

This program will commemorate the 67th anniversary of Kristallnacht, the Night of Broken Glass, when on November 9-10, 1938, a massive, coordinated attack was carried out against Jews throughout Germany and Austria. A solemn candle lighting ceremony will be held.

Generously co-sponsored by Martin Maxwell, in memory of his two sisters, Josetine and Erna Meisels, who died during the Holocaust, and by the Gottesman family, in memory of Herman Gottesman

Forty years ago the Roman Catholic Church held the 2nd Vatican Council, which had as its mandate to renew and re-invigorate the Church. Forty years later, this FULL DAY SEMINAR will present expert speakers who will look at the history of the document and present their ideas concerning what issues need to be addressed in order for Catholic-Jewish dialogue to move forward in a positive and productive manner.

Israeli wins Nobel for economics

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — It may sound strange, but an Israeli has educated the world on conflict resolution.

Robert Aumann

Such was the praise heaped on Robert Aumann, the Hebrew University professor named last week as co-winner of the 2005 Nobel Prize in economics.

Aumann, 75, and American scientist Thomas Schelling "enhanced our understanding of conflict and co-operation through game-theory analysis," the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences said in a statement.

The two will share the $1.3 million (US) prize.

Game theory is the science of strategy, the study of how various rival groups – whether business colleagues or warring parties – can interact to secure an ideal outcome. Aumann specialized in "repeated games," analyzing conflict over time.

"I am very moved by this honour," he told reporters outside his office at the Hebrew University's Center for Rationality. "I think credit should also go to members of the school of thought who have helped to make Israel perhaps the world's No. 1 superpower when it comes to game theory."

Aumann, who is religiously observant, was born in Frankfurt but moved to the United States with his family in 1938. He took degrees from the City College of New York and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, emigrating to Israel in 1956.

Aumann is the second Israeli to win the Nobel for economics. Two Israeli biochemists shared the Nobel Prize for chemistry last year, and

The News in Brief

CANADA

Female Clergy Hired

HAMILTON — Beth Jacob Congregation, a Conservative shul in Hamilton, has hired fifth-year rabbinical student Julia Andelman as its part-time spiritual leader for the coming year, replacing Rabbi Mark Biller, who left after six years for a pulpit in New Jersey. She will fly in once a month from New York, where she studies at the Jewish Theological Seminary, to lead Friday night and Shabbat morning services, and to teach an adult education class. A Newton, Mass., native, Andelman graduated from Harvard University in 1998 with a degree in visual arts.

Quake Relief Needed

TORONTO — UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has set up a fund to help survivors of the Oct. 8 earthquake that hit India, Afghanistan and Pakistan. The money will finance the efforts of IsrAid and other Israeli relief groups. To donate, call 416-631-5700 or visit www.jewishtoronto.com.

Trader Charged

TORONTO — The Ontario Securities Commission has filed three charges against Boaz Manor, the Israeli cofounder of the hedge fund Portus Alternative Asset Management. He is accused of improperly diverting some $95 million in clients' funds to Portus and himself; of destroying documents and lying to regulators; and of trading securities without proper registration or filing a prospectus. Manor faces up to 15 years in jail and $15 million in fines, Bloomberg News reported. He fled to Israel after Portus was shut down in February, and his lawyer says he's too sick to talk to investigators. Portus, which he and Michael Mendelson cofounded in 2003, was one of Canada's largest hedge funds, with $800 million in assets.

Rabbis Rap Madonna

SAFED — Madonna has angered some Israeli rabbis with a song about a famous Jewish mystic. The pop singer's upcoming album Confessions on a Dance Floor includes a song titled Isaac, which is reportedly a paean to Rabbi Isaac Luria, the 16th-century kabbalist mystic also known as the Ari. "This is an inappropriate act, and one can only pity [Madonna] at the punishment she will receive from Heaven," Rabbi Rafael Cohen, head of the Ari Yeshiva in Safed, told Ma'ariv. "The Ari is holy and pure, and immodest people cannot sing about him."

Graves Desecrated

ST. PETERSBURG — A Jewish cemetery in St. Petersburg, Russia's second biggest city, was vandalized. About 50 headstones were destroyed or seriously damaged in the incident, which was reported Oct. 6. Local Jewish leaders called on police to investigate. The vandalism may have stemmed from a dispute between two firms that operate the cemetery, which has been desecrated many times in recent years.

Jewish School Opens

MOSCOW — A new Jewish educational complex was dedicated Oct. 9 in Moscow. The 6,000-square-foot building will house a Jewish day school for 300 children. The multimillion-dollar complex, believed to be the first Jewish school built in Russia since the 1917 Revolution, is a project of the Chabad-led Federation of Jewish Communities, Russia's largest Jewish group.

Gold Train Apology

WASHINGTON — The United States has apologized for its role in the Hungarian "Gold Train" affair. In 1945, U.S. troops confiscated a train full of Hungarian Jewish property looted by the Nazis. No serious attempt was ever made to return the property to its owners, and the U.S. government settled a class-action lawsuit this year by paying $25 million, most of it to Hungarian Holocaust survivors in need, and by pledging an apology, which came Oct. 11.

Jews Stone Shul

LONDON — Jews in London stoned a Stamford Hill synagogue that belongs to the Neturei Karta, a small haredi anti-Zionist sect. The shul's windows were smashed and its front spray-painted with red paint on Oct. 8, the Hackney Gazette reported.

Rabbis Convert 200 B'nai Menashe in India

CALCUTTA — Israeli rabbis have formally converted some Indians who say they are descended from Jews.

Some 200 members of the B'nai Menashe underwent conversion last month under six rabbinical judges dispatched to India by the Shavei Israel organization.

The conversions were performed with the approval of Israel's chief Sephardi rabbi, Shlomo Amar. Last March, he recognized the B'nai Menashe, who live near in the eastern Indian states of Mizoram and Manipur and claim descent from the lost Israelite tribe of Menashe, as "descendants of Israel," and agreed to restore them to the Jewish people.

According to Shavei Ismel, more than 800 B'nai Menashe have immigrated to the Jewish state.

Same old Hadassah-WIZO bazaar – with a few tweaks

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After 80 years, more than 80,000 Toronto Hadassah-WIZO volunteers have helped run the organization's annual fall bazaar, which has attracted more than one million shoppers.

The 81st Hadassah-WIZO bazaar, set for Nov. 2 at the National Trade Centre, Exhibition Place, promises to keep up the longstanding tradition, with an additional few tweaks.

Along with her co-chairs Sherri Pinsker, 37, and Robyn Ulster, 38, Bresge says the trio has taken over bazaar leadership from more senior members of the organization.

"It's an intensive year, planning the bazaar, and the organization had run into a leadership vacuum. They needed new blood to take over, or there was the risk of seeing an end to the [annual tradition.] Everyone wanted a bazaar but there was no one to lead it."

Independent of one another, the three women decided almost a year ago, that they would commit their time and energy to ensuring that the bazaar continues.

Their first task as a team, says Bresge, was to find a warehouse to house merchandise donation. "We've had one donated on a long-term basis so that will also help ensure the bazaar's continuity."

Shopper makes a purchase at last year's bazaar.

They've spent much of the year procuring those donations finding corporate sponsors, which have doubled since last year, and co-ordinating the bazaar committee. "The senior members have been very supportive. They're very encouraged by [the fact] that a younger generation is taking over bazaar," says Ulster.

"There's a misconception that the bazaar is a big garage sale. We actually sell very little used merchandise; most items are brand new, and they're sold at great prices," says Pinsker.

Among the merchandise being offered – a lot was procured from the chapter level – is a lot of new toys, designer shoes, clothing, kitchenware and books. There is kosher food for sale, and they're also planning a fashion show and a live auction for which they're seeking a celebrity master of ceremonies.

"We're doing what we can to give it a new feel. We've tried to bring in better merchandise and we're giving away door prizes throughout the day. Usually we get about 10,000 shoppers, but we're hoping to raise the bar," says Bresge.

The women stress, however, that they haven't "thrown out" the long-standing traditions.

"Bazaar has a lot of credibility, and people within the Jewish community and outside of it look forward to it every year," says Bresge.

The one-day event means a lot to each of them, they say. "I can remember my great-grandmother taking her brisket on the streetcar in Montreal to bring it to the bazaar," says Pinsker.

Bresge, who grew up in Winnipeg, also attended the bazaar. "We had a small Jewish community, and to us Hadassah was [a very important institution]."

The future that must be avoided

From the editor's desk

Twice since Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza last summer, the political aides of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas have attempted to arrange a meeting between the two leaders.

Both times the efforts failed, a sign that the two respective staffs could not agree ahead of time on all aspects of the intended outcomes of the meetings.

In less contentious parts of the world, where neighbours share interests as well as borders, it is not unusual for summit meetings to be nothing more than photo opportunities rather than working sessions of statecraft. Electronic images of a leader of government in the collegial yet earnest company of a fellow head of government are generally a gold mine of good domestic press.

But in the severely damaged relations between the Palestinians and the Israelis, non-working summits are generally to be avoided. The Israeli and Palestinian publics are themselves so factionally riven that it would actually be disadvantageous domestically – especially for Abbas – to be seen in the smiling company of his counterpart in the absence of any tangible results from that meeting.

Palestinian elections are scheduled for January and Abbas does not want to appear to be Sharon's "poodle" – to use the asperity most feared in Middle East politics – and thereby offer up a windfall of partisan propaganda for Hamas, his main opponents.

But Abbas was expected to visit Washington this week. There will undoubtedly be some diplomatic messages for Sharon from President George W. Bush and as a result of the latter's discussions with the Palestinian leader.

I would hazard that the next attempt to arrange a Sharon-Abbas summit will likely not fail.

It is now nearly two months since Israel completed its unilateral withdrawal from Gaza. And though he would have it otherwise, the political spotlight is still shining its hot light at the moment clearly upon Abbas. The U.S. government and quite surprisingly, the Europeans too, have called on him to assert PA control of the area.

Despite some efforts lately by the PA police at disarming the many murderous gangs who use their weapons against Palestinians and Israelis alike, anarchy still rules.

Alas, three Israelis were killed and five were wounded in two back-to-back, drive-by shooting attacks on Sunday afternoon at a hitchhiking post in Gush Etzion between Bethlehem and Hebron. One of the victims was 15 years old. Another had been married merely three months ago.

The leadership of the Al-Aksa Martyrs' Brigades claimed responsibility for the shootings and the killings. When they kill Israelis, these heroic Palestinian "freedom fighters" also kill a little bit more of the possibility of coexistence with their Jewish neighbours.

Abbas realizes and understands this too. But he appears unmoved by the apparent withering of the possibility of coexistence. He seems to have adopted a strategy of appearing intent on truly governing without actually taking the necessary steps to do so. It is as if he simply wants to stretch the process as long as possible, while still retaining, nominal if not functional, governmental control.

The reason, we can speculate, is that he knows, as we all do, that the political spotlight that is focused on him at the moment will inevitably be shifted back onto Israel. He is banking on the fact that the international goodwill that the disengagement engendered toward Israel will be short-lived. He is merely waiting for the next round of international pressure on Israel.

In an incisive analysis by Hillel Halkin called Israel After Disengagement in the October 2005 issue of Commentary, we catch a glimpse of the possible form such future pressure may take.

"And time is not in Israel's favour. This is so not just demographically. In recent years, the propaganda push to depict Israel as an apartheid state in which ruling Jews victimize helpless Palestinians has been gaining frightening momentum. Apart from the United States, there is scarcely a western country in which, despite years of Palestinian terror, anti-Israel sentiment in the media and intellectual life is not dominant and getting stronger.

"This is especially the case in Europe, whose large and feared Muslim populations have also helped tip the balance of public opinion against the Jewish state. But even in America, Israel's image has steadily eroded, as evidenced by the recent disinvestment campaigns of large liberal church groups. Although fortunately there is still a long way to go, it is no longer unimaginable that Israel may one day come to be so widely regarded as a latter-day South Africa that public pressure will encourage Western governments, in any case anxious to cozy up to Arab and Muslim nations, to treat it as one.

"From the South African analogy, moreover, has flowed an idea that is increasingly voiced even though it is the most absurd of all. If a resemblance to apartheid South Africa is the problem, this line of reasoning goes, then let a resemblance to post-apartheid South Africa be the solution. Turn Israel/Palestine into a single, one-man, one-vote country, and let justice and harmony reign."

If this is the future turn of diplomatic posturing against Israel, then Abbas will want to stretch the process indefinitely. But we must all be prepared. And resist it.

Alicia's mom delivers final love letter to daughter

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Alicia Ross was laid to rest recently following a funeral service that paid tribute to the young woman's zest for life, her adventurousness and her love of family.

Alicia Ross

Sharon Fortis, Alicia's mother, delivered a final love letter to her daughter – a eulogy that was by turns tender, nostalgic, loving, humorous, intimate and sad.

Many of the 1,500 people at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue were moved to tears as Fortis recounted memorable moments in her 25-year-old daughter's abbreviated life.

Alicia was her "bashert," destined to be with her since she was adopted as an infant. "I fell in love with that baby girl and will hold my love until the day I lie beside her," Fortis said.

Alicia "was an adorable and good baby, a precocious toddler, a blossoming pre-teen and a terrible, terrible teenager." Eventually she gained her independence and became "a lovely, mature, appreciative woman."

"Alicia loved her family, our dogs, her friends. She loved reading good books, listening to music, her job, travelling, going on canoe trips, going to rock concerts. She loved working out in the gym, watching 24 and The Amazing Race – always saying 'we could do that mummy!' I can't swim."

Alicia was close to her stepfather, "Julie," and would turn to him for advice and emotional support. The two shared a love that "went two ways."

Though a mature woman, Alicia retained her attachment to pieces of fluff, her "shmoochy," when she slept. Fortis recalled a canoe and camping trip to Algonquin Park she and Alicia undertook five years ago.

"That night we lay on the dock in the Muskoka in pitch black dark, staring at the stars, sharing a bottle of red wine, making spooky faces into our flashlights and laughing our drunken heads off. She said to me, 'Mummy, it doesn't get any better than this.' No, it doesn't. Later, my five-foot-10, 20-year-old baby slept in my arms, smelling her shmoochy in one hand, sucking her finger with the other, and I was happy."

Alicia had recently been hired by Hewlett-Packard, where "she blossomed from a nervous, uninformed greenhorn to an appreciated member of the team," Fortis said.

When Fortis visited the firm recently to thank people for their support and to pick up Alicia's personal belongings, she was told by one of Alicia's co-workers that she had had a profound impact on his life.

The co-worker and his wife were childless and when Alicia asked if they planned to adopt, he said no, because he "'would be crushed if his child ever wanted to find her biological mother.' Alicia said, 'I didn't… I have the best mother in the world, and we have a wonderful relationship. Why would I need anyone else?' He then told me he had been so inspired by her, he went home and told his wife he'd changed his mind – he now wants to adopt. He then told me, that as a tribute, if they adopt a girl, he hopes to name her Alicia."

Fortis closed her eulogy by singing a favourite lullaby to her daughter: "Down in the valley, the valley so low/ Hang your head over and hear the wind blow/ Roses love sunshine, violets love dew/ Angels in heaven say 'I love you.' Good night my zeese kind – my sweet child.

"From mummy and Julie, your brothers and sister, your bubbie, aunts, uncles and cousins and your friends who will love you forever: good night, our love, our dove, our tender vine, our lily among the thorns."

Toronto man one of two living survivors of Nazi camp

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Joseph Peretz spent 18 months in a forced labour camp in France during World War II. The Belgian-born Toronto resident, an 84-year-old retired real estate broker, is one of only two living survivors of Les Mazures.

The other man, Jules Koganovitsch, lives in Antwerp and attended the unveiling of a monument on the site of the camp in the Ardennes – now a soccer field – this summer. Peretz, whose vigor belies his age, says he received notice about the event too late to make plans.

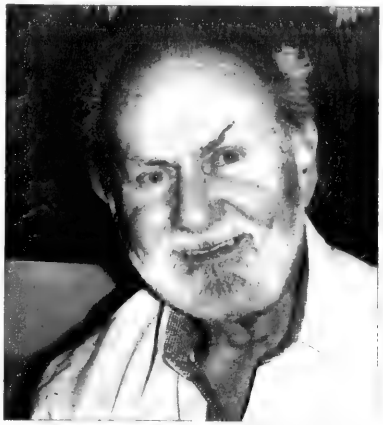
In July 1942, Peretz and approximately 300 other Jewish men from Antwerp were deported to the work camp, where they laboured "under harsh circumstances" making charcoal to fuel German trucks. Before the Germans invaded Belgium in 1940, Peretz apprenticed as a goldsmith and spent two months in obligatory military service, a stint that was cut short under German occupation.

Eventually, 28,000 Jews were deported from Belgium to Auschwitz. Peretz was part of a group at Les Mazures that was also transferred to the infamous concentration camp, but he managed to escape when an armed guard at the train station was looking the other way.

About 22 men were able to escape from the car once it was moving. They were given asylum by members of the Resistance in France until the end of the war.

Peretz wrote his memoirs a decade ago in a book called The Endless Wait. In the recollection, originally written for his daughter, granddaughters and four great-grandchildren, he also writes about Josie, his wife of almost 61 years. She lived under an assumed name during the war, and even managed to visit him once at Les Mazures when she was a teenager, wearing a large cross around her neck to lend credence to her charade. Their wedding was the first Jewish wedding in Antwerp after the war.

The French-language commemorative plaque at the site of Les Mazures calls the camp an "antechamber of death before Auschwitz." It concludes with a quote from Primo Levi, the Italian-born author and Holocaust survivor, asking visitors that "our deaths not be in vain."



Joseph Peretz

Of the approximately 300 Belgian Jews at Les Mazures, 237 died in Auschwitz and other concentration camps, 27 survived those camps, 22 escaped Les Mazures successfully, and two were killed in Belgium after escaping.

The plaque was installed by the Association pour la Mémoire du Judenlager des Mazures, a group of families of survivors of the camp, their rescuers, and historians including Jean-Emile Andreux, a Belgian professor living in France.

He and Yaël Reicher, the group's Brussels-based president, were responsible for having the memorial installed, said Peretz. The next projects, already in the works, involve filing documents to have Emile Fontaine, the resistance leader in the area, as well as the local stationmaster, a Monsieur Devingt who was also a member of the resistance, declared Righteous Gentiles.

In an eloquent speech at the memorial, Reicher said the group has an obligation – in memory of their loved ones and with future generations in mind – to say no to racism, intolerance, hatred and crime.

Chevreh, it's time to do business in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

At an evening meeting in a plush midtown hotel, Israeli trade commissioner Ephraim Shoham had a message for the 160 people in attendance: Israel is open for business – to Israelis!

Though not quite preaching to the choir, Shoham delivered his message of taking their business to Israel to a group of Israeli business people now living in Toronto. Delivered almost entirely in Hebrew, the message was clear: chevreh, you've done well here in Canada, now bring your talents, capital, skills and ambitions back to Ha'aretz.

Speaking to The CJN after the event, Shoham said "the purpose was to meet Israeli business people living in the Toronto area and to attract them with business offers from Israel."

Israeli firms have approached the economic mission for help in hooking up with business partners in Canada. There are deals to be made in numerous industries, including consumer products, space technology, biotech, information technology, software and electronics, he said.

Some are looking to invest in Canada and are seeking local partners. Others would like to develop Canada as an export market for their products.

Shoham said his office is acting as a business shadchan, bringing together entrepreneurs, hoping to create a perfect match.

"My office receives requests every day from Israeli companies who want help finding Canadian distributors, agents and customers, and also startups developing new products are looking for Canadian investors," he said.

The Canadian market can be difficult to break into, he said. Canadian businesses are oriented southward, towards their American neighbour. Canada exports only about $280 million (US) to Israel while Israel sells $380 million in products to Canada, with another $150 million in goods entering Canada via the United States.

About $1 billion is invested by Israeli real estate companies in Canada, he added.

Some Canadians are already doing business in Israel. Montreal-based real estate developer David Azrieli has become famous for introducing Canadian-style shopping malls, while Creo, a British Columbia company, purchased Scitex, an Israeli firm specializing in computerized printing systems.

A global office furniture company has established two plants in Israel that produce merchandise for sale in Europe, taking advantage of Israel's free trade agreement with the EU.

One businessman involved in a number of projects in Israel is Eli Rubinstein, president of Canadel Inc. Rubinstein, a Toronto-based land developer, has been doing business in Israel for years "and it's been a real roller coaster," he told The CJN. "Overall, it's been a positive and gratifying decision with no regrets."

His passion for Israel drew him to do business in the country and he has recorded some major successes there, in part by introducing a Canadian way of building.

Lev Ha'Park, for instance, is a model development launched in 1991 in the town of Ra'anana, northeast of Tel Aviv. The last unit was sold about a month ago. The development involved 756 units in 42 buildings that included a combination of condominium and rental units.

The development was unique for Israel in that it introduced the concept of master planning an entire community, as opposed to the more haphazard approach undertaken prior to the project. That meant creating a lushly landscaped neighbourhood atmosphere "to make it all fit together." It included a unity of design and resident friendly streets, including pedestrian malls, what the locals call "Dutch streets," Rubinstein said.

Rubinstein believes real estate developers can prosper in Israel if they bring something new and desirable to the market.

Other projects he is involved with include the 30-storey Isrotel Tower in Tel Aviv, a building that doubles as a condominium and luxury hotel, and the Okeanos BaMarina multi-building project in Herzliyah that features 200 suites.

Rubinstein said he has witnessed a remarkable upsurge in optimism in recent years, with Israeli entrepreneurs launching new projects.

Uriel Domb, founder of Telespace Inc., a privately held firm that helps clients plan, launch and operate satellites, told the gathering that projects in the high frontier field start with person-to-person contacts. He recommended that entrepreneurs in Canada "identify the project, identify the individual and go ahead and do it."

Israel launched its first satellite, Ofek, in the mid-1980s to gather military intelligence. In 1996 it launched the Amos 1 telecommunications satellite and followed that up with Amos 2. It is set to soon launch Amos 3. Telespace is involved in the ground control for Amos 3, which will be used for television broadcasts, direct to home broadcasts and data communications.

Domb suggested there are many applications that could be loaded onto satellites, including satellite radio (think Sirius and XM) and global positioning navigation (with a maritime application).

"Because I'm Israeli, I take greater interest in business in Israel," Domb said. "If we do business with Israel, others will see that and repeat it."

"You can do business in Israel in space and in other sectors, and you don't have to wait for the government to point the way for you. If you have your own initiative, contacts in Israel are more open to external business opportunities than Canadian business or government," he said.

Worthy resolution

The holiday of Sukkot is resplendent with rich, colourful symbols and motifs. The central motif, of course, revolves around the temporary, insubstantial, starlight-visible, thatched-roof sukkah that we are enjoined to build as a weeklong commemoration of the Exodus from Egypt. And, unlike the two companion pilgrimage holidays of Pesach and Shavuot, we are expressly bidden to "take happy delight in this holiday."

Thus, the five-day transition from the end of Yom Kippur to the start of Sukkot is from sombre introspection to joyful celebration – a biblically ordained and rabbinically imagined catharsis for the constantly striving Jewish soul.

One of the important issues that troubles the Jewish soul is the core existential one of Jewish demographics. No statement illustrates the knife-in-the-heart dilemma of Jewish demographics more starkly than the following: In 1939, there were approximately 18 million Jews in the world. In 1945, there were approximately 12 million Jews in the world. In 2005, there are approximately 13 million Jews in the world!

Many of the enemies of the Jews who attribute virtually every natural or man-made calamity to Jewish conspiracy might have second thoughts if they knew these numbers. But then, if they actually did think about things or even read, they might not be enemies of the Jews. For our own sake, however –for the sake of the Jewish people – these numbers should actually stop us in our tracks and cause us to think deeply about our own contributions to a future for the Jews.

As demographers, sociologists, educators, historians and community leaders of every stripe have been saying for decades, the only sure way to ensure meaningful Jewish life is by fostering meaningful Jewish identity. And the only sure way to foster meaningful Jewish identity is through the expansive availability of intensive, inspiring Jewish education – broadly defined.

The cause of facilitating Jewish education for the widest swath of families possible is the single most urgent and most far-reachingly important cause for our community leaders. Involvement in Jewish life and Jewish causes – whatever they are – flows only from a sense of Jewish self that derives from Jewish education. That is why we call attention to the Yom Kippur resolution issued last week by the Orthodox Union that calls on the Jewish community to dedicate 5766 to Jewish Education. To be sure, the OU focuses primarily on Torah literacy and Torah education. But its message was also aimed far wider.

"Believing that the key to building a vibrant Jewish nation is Jewish knowledge, we will take important steps to help the entire (North) American Jewish community increase investments, resources and time on Jewish education," the resolution states. "We call upon the entire Jewish community – through its federations, foundations and communal campaigns – to ensure the Jewish identity of all of our children and grandchildren by dedicating 5766 to Jewish education."

The OU resolution is a worthy one. We must all take it to heart and commit its important message to action.

The term 'suicide bomber'

Whether innocent people are killed and maimed in Israel, London, Bali or elsewhere, it is time to stop referring to the perpetrators as suicide bombers. To do so almost creates the picture of somewhat of a hero with a noble purpose, when in fact the opposite is true. Because of the complete lack of respect for the dignity of life and the absence of any feeling of humanity and compassion, I propose that instead of the words suicide bomber, the media should call them psychopathic mass murderers. With that characterization, I believe supporting countries would have difficulty describing these butchers as martyrs or freedom fighters.

Shabbat in northern Vermont

The article "Shabbat at sea off Baffin Island" (CJN, Sept. 22) reminded me of a similar, wonderful Shabbat experience I had a few years ago.

My family and I were on summer vacation at Jay Peak in the Green Mountains of northern Vermont, a place that is better known for winter skiing. As the week progressed, I told my wife that it would be a wonderful idea to have a minyan for Shabbat services. We didn't know of any other Jews staying there, but I didn't let that stop me.

I received a list from the hotel of people renting townhouses for the month, and with the list in hand, I called every name that sounded Jewish. After all the phone calls were made, we were still short of a minyan by three men. One man wasn't home, but his wife said he would call me back later. Even with him, we would still be short by two. Still, I didn't give up hope. I remembered what my teacher in yeshiva taught me years before: that a Jew never gives up hope, that if you give up hope, you're not thinking straight!

Thursday night, I received a phone call. It was the man calling back. He said he would be delighted to attend as would two of his buddies, who were also Jewish. I realized then that if everybody came who said they would come, we would have our minyan for Shabbat!

Friday morning, I went back to the city, a two-hour drive, to get a sefer Torah, talleisim, siddurim, Chumashim and yarmulkes. I made a big Shabbat Shalom sign with a picture of a mountain peak in the background, which we taped onto the front door. We set up the chairs facing east, which just happened to face the mountain. We spread a tallit over the kitchen counter from which we would read the Torah, and arranged a kiddush on the dining room table.

Shacharit was called for 10 a.m. (The people were on vacation, after all.) By 10:05, the entire minyan had arrived! We even had a kohen! All the men were wearing Bermuda shorts and baseball caps, which they kept on. They were an ideal minyan, as there was no talking during the davening.

Before Shacharit, some of the men came over to me and told me not to give a certain older man an aliyah because he didn't know Hebrew. I decided there and then that this man would definitely get one. When I called him, he refused to get up. I told him I would help him say the blessings, and reluctantly, he agreed. After his aliyah, he started crying in front of everybody.

I took him aside privately and asked him what was wrong. He told me that because of an embarrassing incident that occurred to him in a shul more than 60 years ago, he vowed he would never enter a shul again. His friends convinced him that this was not a real shul, but more of an adventure. He furthermore told me that because of that incident, he never had a bar mitzvah. I told him that by receiving his first ever aliyah that morning, he was "officially" bar mitzvahed! All choked up, the man said he couldn't wait to tell his grandchildren. After services, I told everyone that the kiddush was in honour of this man's bar mitzvah!

The next Shabbat at Jay Peak we once again had our minyan with the same men who had come the week before. But this time, they were dressed in long pants, and all, without exception, put on a yarmulke! There was some talking going on, but as my wife pointed out to me, "Now, it's a real shul!"

'Find of the century' may be King David's palace

By DAVID HAZONY

In what many archeologists hail as the potential find of the century, remains of a massive structure dating to the time of King David have been discovered in the heart of biblical Jerusalem. Eilat Mazar, the Israeli archeologist leading the excavation, has suggested that it may in fact be the palace built by David as described in the Bible.

The discovery has shaken the already contentious field of biblical archeology to its roots. For the last few years, a number of respected archeologists—most prominently Israel Finkelstein, chair of Tel Aviv University's archeology department and author of the 2001 bestseller The Bible Unearthed – have argued that the biblical accounts of Jerusalem as the seat of a great and united monarchy under the rule of David and Solomon are false. If Mazar's hypothesis proves right, it would go a long way toward proving them wrong.

Her findings will also doubtlessly affect the broader political battle over Jerusalem – that is, the question of whether the Jewish people have their origins in the city, and thus have a special hold over it, or whether the concept of a Jewish origin in Jerusalem is nothing but a myth.

With such a potentially powerful find, there will naturally be no shortage of skeptics, whether for reasons of politics or scholarship. Yet there are many good reasons to identify Mazar's find, at least provisionally, as the palace described in the book of Samuel. These reasons deserve to be heard.

According to archeological evidence, Jerusalem was founded two millennia before David arrived on the scene in 1000 BCE. Because of its unique topography – a high hill nestled between two deep valleys that converge at its southern point, graced with abundant sources of water and exposed to attack only along a ridge from the north – the location proved ideal for the capital of a kingdom. Therefore, David did not destroy the city when he conquered it from the Jebusites, but rather added to it. The most notable addition was the palace built by the Phoenician king, Hiram of Tyre, as a gesture of friendship.

Based on the biblical account, coupled with textual clues as to the topography and findings previously published by Kathleen Kenyon, Mazar formulated her proposal as to the location of the palace in a 1997 article in Biblical Archaeology Review. "If some regard as too speculative the hypothesis, I shall put forth in this article," she wrote, "my reply is simply this: let us put it to the test in the way archeologists always try to test their theories – by excavation." In early 2005, with the support of the Jerusalem-based Shalem Center, the City of David Foundation and the Hebrew University, Mazar did just that.

The evidence she found is remarkable. A section of a massive wall, which runs about 100 feet from west to east before making a right-angle turn heading south, implies the existence of a very large building. Other findings include pottery shards, discovered in the dirt-fill between the stones of the wall, which were dated to the 11th century BCE, the earliest possible date of the building's construction.

Additionally, the building is positioned directly on bedrock along the city's northern edge with no archeological layers beneath it. This implies that the structure, built two millennia after the city's founding, constituted a new, northward expansion of the city's limits, as described in the biblical account. It is located at what was then the summit of the mountain – a reasonable place for the palace from which David is said, in II Samuel 5:17, to have "descended."

Some of the many pieces of pottery found on the site.

Finally, Mazar discovered a remarkable clay bulla, or signet impression, bearing the name of Yehuchal Ben Shelemiah, a Judean prince from the time of King Zedekiah mentioned by name in Jeremiah 37:3 – evidence suggesting that four centuries after David, the site was still an important seat of Judean royalty. This matches the biblical account of the palace being in continuous use from its construction until the destruction of Judea by the Babylonians in 586 BCE.

The evidence seems to agree surprisingly well with Mazar's claim that this could be David's palace. The location, size, style and dating of the building all match the textual description and there are no finds that suggest the contrary, such as the idolatrous statuettes or ritual crematoria found in contemporary Phoenician settlements. Furthermore, the building appears in an ancient world where such constructions were extremely rare and represented the greatest sort of public works. Finally, the evidence fits well with previous archeological finds from the site.

Naturally, many archeologists, having been trained in a scholarly world wary of religious enthusiasts, will be extremely reluctant to identify any new archeological find with particulars found in the Bible. Others, driven by a combination of interests, ideologies or political agendas, will seize on any shred of uncertainty in the building's identification to distract attention from the momentousness of the find. Both groups will invoke professionalism and objectivity to undermine the proposition that this was David's palace: they will either raise the bar of required proofs to a standard that no archeological find could ever meet or they will simply dismiss it all as wishful thinking in the service of religious or Zionist motives.

Yet even if this is not in fact David's palace, there is no doubt that we are talking about an archeological find of revolutionary proportions. It is still the first discovery of a major construction from the early Israelite period in Jerusalem. No longer is it reasonable to claim, as many revisionist archeologists have done, that the absence of evidence from the relevant period shows that the great unified monarchy of David and Solomon was really an imaginary historiosophic creation. It is thus significant that the normally reserved Mazar, one of the most esteemed scholars in the field of biblical archeology and author of the standard textbook Archaeology of the Land of the Bible, 10,000-586 B.C.E., has described the discovery as "something of a miracle."

Furthermore, so long as we are willing to admit that possible future evidence may prompt a different conclusion, there is no reason not to identify this building as David's palace. Put simply, we have before us two things – a biblical text describing in detail the creation of a Phoenician-style palace by David on a particular mountain around the end of the 11th or beginning of the 10th century BCE and a grand Phoenician-style structure dating from the same time on the summit of that very mountain, located with assistance from the text and previous archeological discoveries.

Is this absolute proof? No. But surely it is enough to shift the burden of proof. For in the end, the theory that this is David's palace is thus far the best explanation for the data. Mazar says, "Anyone who wants to say otherwise ought to come up with a better theory."

A truly magical wedding

It was true Hollywood magic. Actors Ashton Kutcher and Demi Moore recently got married in a ceremony that (according to the Kabbalah Center) was "full of understanding, wisdom, and connections that essentially sew the two soul-halves together, creating one new whole soul." What's more magical than a celebrity Kabbalah wedding?

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

We all love magical rituals that purport to offer blessing. Isn't it wonderful that, with a few quotes from the mystical Zohar, a marriage becomes indestructible? Isn't it great that you can transform your life by drinking whisky at a holy man's grave? And if the source of these charms is a respected tradition, how bad can it be?

Actually, very bad. Our relationship with God should be wholesome, based on spirituality and ethics. These "holy" superstitions turn God into a heavenly slot machine. They try to manipulate God – you drink special water or carry an obscure, but expensive, Aramaic book so that God will bless you.

Of course, we chase these superstitions because we love miracles. They give us hope and optimism. The problem is we chase the wrong miracles.

The Kotzker Rebbe has a wonderful interpretation of the selection of Rebeccah, Isaac's wife. Eliezer, Isaac's servant, stands by the well in search of a wife for Isaac. He decides that the proper choice will be any woman who is kind enough to offer him, a stranger, water. The midrash adds that while he is watching Rebeccah, water miraculously jumps out of the well into her jug. Yet Eliezer continues to wait to see if she will treat him with kindness. The Kotzker Rebber wonders: shouldn't Rebeccah have been chosen immediately? Wasn't a miracle enough evidence of her worthiness?

He offers an illuminating response: Eliezer waited "because one act of kindness is worth 1,000 miracles".

Indeed, the greatest miracles are the ones where people act with kindness. At a wedding, when two people vow to love each other forever, the greatest miracle, true love, is present.

So, with apologies to Ashton and Demi, I'd like to note a truly magical wedding. Jennifer Pollack and Andrew Friedberg were to be married Sept. 4 in New Orleans. Unfortunately, because of Hurricane Katrina, they had to relocate to Houston. They left everything behind – ketubah, gown, tuxedo, rings. The Houston community came to their rescue and outfitted them with everything they needed. To complete the circle of giving, the young couple asked that guests make a donation to Katrina relief efforts instead of giving a gift.

This was a truly magical wedding. No, there was no blessed water or passages from the Zohar. What made it magical was the greatest miracle of all: human love and compassion.

Teens need more than 'juvenile Judaism'

Last Sukkot, I heard the same simplistic explanation of the lulav and etrog three times in two days. Being a reasonably intelligent person, I absorbed it the first time around. Actually, as a relatively well-educated Jew, I had already heard that explanation, and others. Yet ours is the age of "juvenile Judaism." In a community made up largely of university graduates, we endure the same simplistic riffs repeatedly.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Indeed, in this era of widespread Jewish illiteracy, the lowest common denominator rules. Professionals who are super-protective of their own areas of expertise blather on about Judaism without any learning or humility. Enabling this pathology, too many rabbis and Jewish professionals have dumbed Judaism down, blithely offering the pshat (basic interpretations) while neglecting Judaism's spiritual, ethical and intellectual depth.

Seeing Judaism as a quaint collection of tribal rituals and childish folktales, too many modern Jews neglect Jewish education. The defining metaphor should be Moses' arms expanding ever-outward toward the heavens – with more and more of us learning more and more complicated, substantive and inspiring insights as we age. Instead, modern Jewry builds Pharoah's pyramid, with more kids learning about Judaism than adults, retreating from a relatively broad base to a dysfunctionally narrow peak.

The big break often comes in high school. A bar or bat mitzvah should launch a more intensive, engaging, empowering Jewish learning journey, not mark the end of a child's formal Jewish education. With most modern Jews' Jewish understanding frozen at the junior high school level, it's no wonder Judaism seems like easily discarded child's play.

The latest research confirms our instincts and anecdotes. The teenage years are critical in identity building. Yet just as students begin navigating beyond the family cocoon, parents foolishly strip them of Jewish compasses, concepts, values and communities.

Elementary school education is necessarily fundamentalist – students first need simple building blocks. During high school, they start building complex ideas from those basics, and they assert their own identities. Moreover, during the teen years, our students confront modern popular culture's seductions most intensely and make essential lifelong alliances with peers. Why deprive them of the added filters of Jewish morality, spirituality and tradition? Why not root them in Jewish friends learning Jewish ideas in a Jewish space, living according to Jewish time by the Jewish calendar? On a limited budget, I would send my child to Jewish high school rather than elementary school, even though our community should free parents from such dilemmas by making Jewish education affordable for all.

Those who fear that Jewish education is too provincial forget how homogenizing and alluring modern teen culture is. Few kids remain cloistered. Those who do can easily transcend that state after only a few weeks in university.

For this vision to succeed, our Jewish high schools must be great, not merely good. They must be centres of excellence, providing top-notch, substantive general and Jewish educations. They must be exciting laboratories for Jewish living and learning, stretching students spiritually, ideologically, emotionally and morally, as well as intellectually. They must be flagship institutions, setting the highest behavioural standards and attracting attention with the most effective teaching techniques – both cutting-edge and traditional – that challenge students to be the best they can be.

Parents should also be encouraged to continue their learning in parallel with their children, even as the kids supplement their experiences through Jewish camps, community service and youth movements.

Mediocrity, rigidity, sloppiness, obsolescence and laziness are unacceptable. The stakes are too high. A bad Jewish high school experience is worse than no Jewish high school experience at all.

All of us, community leaders and philanthropists, parents and professionals, must take responsibility for delivering quality, lifelong Jewish education in all it dimensions, especially to teens.

The lulav (palm branch), lacks taste and smell, while the etrog, sweet and fragrant, represents the rabbinical vision of completeness. The etrog's great taste and smell, I learned repeatedly last year, represent individuals combining learning and morality. Without effective, inspiring and enlightening Jewish education, how can we develop the next generation's ethical and intellectual superstars, or even a committed, competent and literate core who will build an exciting Jewish future?

We must invest the time, money, energy, creativity and soul needed to cultivate a community of sweet etrogim, blessed with a sophisticated education, good enduring values, a positive feeling about being Jewish and a mastery of the modern Western world.

Secular courts, Jewish courts and agunot

During the recent debate in Ontario about the implications of bringing sharia, Muslim law, into the rubric of the province's arbitration act, many pundits drew comparisons between the function of a Jewish court, or beit din, and a sharia court in a Canadian context.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Discussions rarely focused on the role of religious laws in business conflicts. Instead, they pointed to matters of marriage, or, more correctly, the dissolution of marriage in divorce. While Canadian law strives for even-handedness in such issues as property division, support, and custody, both Islamic and Jewish law offer men potent legal advantages over women.

Traditional Jewish law requires that divorce be initiated by husbands, who alone may authorize the writing of the necessary get (divorce contract). The traditional ketubah (marriage contract), is designed to protect the financial interests of the wife should the marriage end. But in reality, some men use this singular power – to initiate and tender a divorce – to extract grossly unfair financial and custody settlements that would not be theirs under civil law. Some men withhold a get out of anger, even after a civil divorce, preventing their ex-wives from remarrying in a Jewish ceremony. Such women, effectively separated but not halachically divorced, are called agunot – anchored ones – anchored to their estranged husband and the ruins of their marriage.

The agunah problem is a product of modernity. Before gaining the rights of citizenship, European Jews lived in Jewish communities that operated as autonomous entities, which – subject to the laws of the lands they were in – exerted authority over constituents. Rabbis could apply sanctions to recalcitrant husbands who unfairly withheld a get. Jews subsequently won the rights of citizenship as individuals, but lost communal autonomy and the ability to enforce rabbinic rulings.

In North America, Jews have worked with civic legislators to apply sanctions in such cases. Under New York state law, for example, civil courts may impose financial penalties on a legally divorced man whose withholding of a get presents "a bar" to his wife's remarriage. Canadian law can prevent a divorced man from remarrying if his ex-wife has been refused a get. Under Ontario law – which the premier has said will change – family courts can penalize a recalcitrant ex-husband in settling divorce related claims until he issues a get.

The impetus for get legislation in North America came from the Jewish community, not – as many pundits during the recent sharia debate asserted – from federal or provincial governments seeking to bring the Jewish court system into compliance with Canadian (or, for that matter, American) norms. In fact, Jewish groups have worked creatively with secular courts to accomplish what has eluded most Orthodox authorities operating solely within halachah. The Jewish community should be proud of utilizing civic courts to ameliorate the tragedy of the agunah, and to limit the power of unscrupulous men to use halachah for personal gain or vengeance. But such solutions are also a mark of failure of Orthodox rabbinic authorities to come up with a solution on purely halachic grounds.

Reform Jews have done away with the need for a get, viewing a civil divorce as sufficient. Several decades ago, Rabbi Saul Lieberman introduced a ketubah amendment commonly called the Lieberman clause. Adopted by the Conservative movement, it provides that should a marriage break down, either spouse may summon the other to a beit din and both would be required to follow its instructions.

Some Orthodox rabbis – most notably Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik – approved of this strategy for resolving the problem of agunot, but others felt that it did not comply with the demands of halachah that a get be given freely and without coercion.

Blu Greenberg once famously said, "Where there is a rabbinic will, there is a halachic way." A few courageous rabbis have implemented halachic solutions to the problems of agunot, without turning to the secular courts for muscle. In Israel, this would be the only path for resolution. But such solutions are seen as controversial and have yet to gain wide acceptance.

More than 1,000 years ago, Rabbeinu Gershom, the leading rabbinic authority for Ashkenazi Jews, issued a number of takanot, or ordinances, that lessened the disparity between husband and wife in divorce. He ruled that not only women, but also men, must be monogamous in marriage, and that a wife's consent was required for divorce. Comparable boldness, compassion and fair-mindedness in our time would help the plight of agunot within a halachic framework.

The Kirshner File

A long road lies ahead for Mahmoud Abbas

Three weeks before Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and four isolated settlements in the West Bank last month, Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), the president of the Palestinian Authority, made an observation that may yet haunt his presidency and determine Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's attitude toward him and the whole notion of Palestinian statehood. "Gaza will be an important experience, a test, a challenge for us," he said.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

What he meant is that his success or failure will largely depend on his ability to impose law and order, deliver basic services, revitalize the anemic economy and, last but not least, rein in the militias that have launched rocket and mortar attacks against Israel since the pullout was completed on Sept. 12.

Judging by events since the withdrawal, Abbas – who succeeded Yasser Arafat following last January's parliamentary election – has not gotten off to an auspicious start.

No sooner had the last Israeli soldier vacated Gaza than mobs of Palestinians poured in – looting the ruins of Jewish settlements, stripping hothouses of building materials, burning empty synagogues Israel had strangely not dismantled and swarming past the border into Egypt. All the while, Palestinian police officers nonchalantly stood by, doing virtually nothing to stop the spectacle. The Palestinian prime minister, Ahmed Qureia, urged the looters and the scavengers to end their activities. But his admonition had a hollow ring to it, as if he was merely paying lip service to the virtues of stability.

In effect, the PA was implicitly allowing the hordes to let off steam. It could be argued, from the Palestinians' point of view, that they were viscerally entitled to their moment of triumph. But the overall impression they left as they tore through Gaza in a vengeful binge was not one that inspired confidence, either in Israel or abroad.

Incredibly enough, the eruption of lawlessness in the aftermath of Israel's withdrawal was but the tip of a dangerous iceberg. In a preview of the seething internal tensions that bedevil Gaza, Palestinian police officers and Hamas gunmen waged running street battles in early October in which three Palestinians were killed and 40 wounded.

The violence – which was preceded by clashes in May and July over efforts by the PA to enforce the shaky Feb. 8 ceasefire with Israel – broke out after the PA began enforcing a prohibition against militants carrying weapons in public in Gaza. When the dust settled, Palestinian policemen stormed into Gaza's parliament building, demanding a crackdown on the militants and complaining that they were outgunned by Hamas. In the face of the mayhem, Qaddoura Fares, a member of Abbas' mainstream Fatah movement, issued a dire warning: "We are on the verge of a civil war if the situation remains out of control."

Fares' warning fell on deaf ears. Some days later, a senior Palestinian military intelligence official, Bassam Azzam, was seriously wounded when he was shot by unknown assailants who had attempted to kidnap him. Azzam was a close associate of Moussa Arafat, a powerful PA official who was assassinated in September. Shortly after Arafat's murder, Hani al-Hassan, a former PA interior minister and a member of Fatah's central committee, escaped an attempt on his life. Denouncing the chaos as "irresponsible," Abbas pledged to subdue the militants. Abbas, having promised to impose "one authority, one law and one gun" on Gaza, wants to crush the phenomenon of armed militiamen brazenly cruising the streets of Palestinian towns and villages. But by the same token, he has repeatedly rejected Israeli and international appeals to dismantle their operational capabilities once and for all.

Like Arafat, Abbas fears the spectre of a civil war, and is reluctant to deal harshly with the gunmen unless Sharon offers him a political horizon, a firm Israeli assurance that further withdrawals from the West Bank will take place so that the Palestinians can create a viable, geographically contiguous state.

In the meantime, however, Gaza seems to be crumbling, as Yuval Diskin – the director of the Shin Bet, Israel's domestic intelligence agency – has warned. In a rare briefing with reporters, he said that the PA is barely functional, that Abbas is too weak to enforce order, that Hamas took advantage of Israel's pullout to smuggle huge amounts of weapons into Gaza, and that Hamas is increasing its influence in that strip of land, where the economy shrank last year and seven out of 10 Palestinians live below the poverty line.

It is debatable whether Hamas is taking over Gaza and transforming it into an Islamic terrorist bastion, as Israeli opponents of the disengagement had widely predicted. But what seems certain is that Hamas is perfectly capable of igniting tension with Israel and thus imperilling the PA's relationship, such as it is, with Israel.

During the waning days of September, when Israel's 38-year occupation of Gaza was already a memory, Hamas fired dozens of Qassam rockets into Israeli territory, thereby shattering last winter's ceasefire. Some of the Qassams landed in Sderot, a Negev town adjacent to Gaza, and wounded five civilians.

Hamas claimed that it was reacting to an Israeli raid near Tulkarm, in which three Islamic Jihad fugitives were slain, and to an explosion during a Hamas "victory parade" in Gaza, in which more than 15 Palestinians were killed. Hamas charged that Israel fired on the parade, but the PA refuted that accusation, greatly embarrassing Hamas.

Responding to Hamas' rocket barrage, Israel launched Operation First Rain, a one-week offensive in which some 400 members of Hamas and Islamic Jihad in the West Bank were arrested and several of its key operatives in Gaza were assassinated.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas

Abbas, who recently pledged to unleash an "iron fist" against Palestinian militias that break the Feb. 8 truce, protested. But he received no international support. The perception was that Israel was defending its sovereign territory from aggression.

As Abbas floundered, Israel upped the ante. Its defence minister, Shaul Mofaz, threatened to kill two important Hamas leaders, Mahmoud Zahar and Ismail Haniya, if the Qassams continued to fall on Israeli towns. Israel's chief of operations, Gen. Yisrael Ziv, warned that retaliatory artillery strikes would turn the main Qassam launching site, principally the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanun, into an uninhabitable demilitarized zone.

Hamas got the message, promptly silencing its Qassam barrages. But the basic problem festers. Due to Hamas' refusal to disarm, Sharon has expressed opposition to its participation in next January's PA national election. In all likelihood, Abbas will not accede to his request, since Hamas is a fairly formidable force in Palestinian politics. In recent West Bank municipal elections, Hamas won 26 per cent of the vote, compared to Fatah's 54 per cent.

But Abbas is definitely concerned by Hamas' apparent determination to "liberate" the West Bank and Jerusalem. Having described Israel's withdrawal from Gaza as a retreat under fire, a position held by most Palestinians, Hamas is convinced that the West Bank can be wrested from Israel, too.

Abbas also covets the West Bank and eastern Jerusalem, but he prefers to use political means rather than violence to achieve that goal. As he has often said, the militarization of the second Palestinian uprising – the Al Aqsa intifadah, which has taken the lives of some 3,000 Palestinians and about 1,000 Israelis since September 2000 – was a strategic mistake.

Abbas is anxious to move forward on the diplomatic front. But since he and Sharon sharply differ on what comes after Israel's disengagement from Gaza and parts of the West Bank, Abbas' quest for a meeting with the Israeli leader has been twice postponed.

In accordance with the 2003 "road map" peace plan – which envisions a two-state solution – Sharon argues that the onus now lies with the Palestinians, and that they must dismantle the terrrorist infrastructure and end incitement. By contrast, Abbas wants Israel to freeze settlement construction and to fulfil previous obligations, from the release of prisoners to the departure of Israeli troops from West Bank towns.

Since taking office, Abbas has chalked up three achievements. He presided over a smooth transition after Arafat's death last November. He convinced Palestinian militias to abide by a truce, in theory at least. He took over Gaza. But he has yet to gain control over Gaza's crossing points and thereby manage the movement of people and goods; ease the web of Israeli restrictions and checkpoints in the West Bank; secure the release of all Palestinian prisoners; persuade Israel to cease construction of its security barrier, which may yet define its final border; improve the lives of Palestinians; impose his will on Hamas and Islamic Jihad; or convince Sharon to enter into permanent status talks on such crucial issues as settlements, borders, water and refugees.

For Abbas, as for the Palestinians, the road that lies ahead is long and arduous.

Day school enrolment rises

New statistics demonstrate enthusiasm for Jewish education

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA Federation

More students are attending Jewish day schools and pre-schools this year than last year, according to preliminary statistics from UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education.

They show that enrolment at BJE affiliated pre-schools is up by 3 per cent, the number of students attending elementary day schools is down slightly by one per cent and secondary school enrolment has increased by one per cent. Supplementary school figures are not yet available.

The new figures defy predictions by some that enrolment would decline because of tuitions.

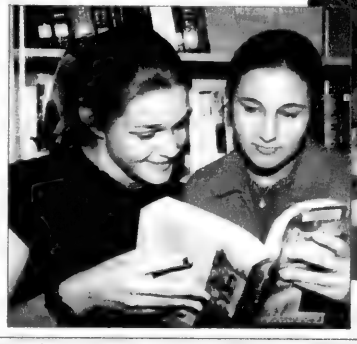
"The relative stability in day school enrolment figures is probably due to the traditional trust that Toronto Jews have in our excellent schools," says Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation's senior vice president of Jewish Education and Identity.

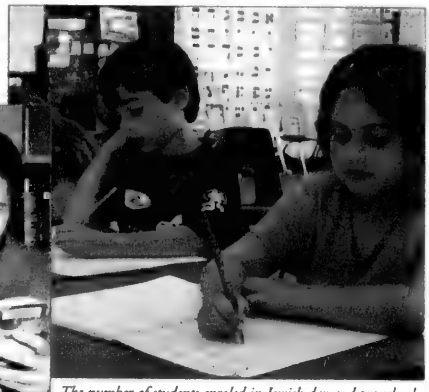
"Generations of Jews in our community have been made Jewishly literate because of the high quality and diverse options in our day schools. Parents know that, and even in a period of low birth-rates and high tuitions, the Toronto tradition of day school education continues to flourish."

The latest figures are even more significant considering the population decline for elementary school age Jewish children. In 1996, there were 20,565 Jewish children of elementary school age. Last year, the corresponding number was 18,680, a drop of nine per cent. Yet the percentage of Jewish children enrolled in elementary day schools increased by five per cent over the same time period.

In total, more than 17,000 students attend Jewish day schools and supplementary schools in the Greater Toronto Area, and community financial support for Jewish education through UJA Federation, at nearly $12 million, is the highest in North America.

"We're excited that day school enrolment is so stable, but we recognize the financial burden of tuition fees on so many families," says UJA Federation Board chair, David Engel. "We are working hard to help out in this area, by supporting Canadian Jewish Congress in hiring a new specialist to advocate for government funding and other measures, about which we are still ironing out details."





The number of students enroled in Jewish day and pre-schools has increased over last year.

UJA Federation opens fund for Asian earthquake victims

UJA Federation's Earthquake Relief Fund for victims of the devastating disaster that struck India, Pakistan and Afghanistan is financing the operations of IsraAid, a delegation of Israeli search and rescue specialists.

IsraAID, best known for its life-saving efforts at the scene of disasters, such as last year's tsunami in south-east Asia and the recent Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans, is a coordinating body of Israeli and Jewish non-governmental organizations active in relief and humanitarian work.

In south-east Asia, following last December's tsunami, IsraAID not only rushed to the scene to provide emergency services, but also remained for months afterward to help with food distribution, housing construction and psycho-social programs.

In Louisiana, IsraAID crew members participated with local authorities in the search for bodies following Hurricane Katrina.

"IsraAID has shown what it can do under the worst possible conditions, to help those in need," said UJA Federation Board chair David Engel. "Its recent work in New Orleans was outstanding, and I have no doubt that its expertise and compassion will make a difference in the lives of many victims of this terrible tragedy."

The earthquake has killed tens of thousands and created more than 4 million refugees whose homes were demolished.

Donations to the UJA Federation Earthquake Relief Fund can be made online at www.jewishtoronto.com or by calling the hotline at 416.631.5700.

A first for the United Jewish Communities General Assembly

Global Jewish Marketplace open to the public

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

So much to do. So little time!

Participants at this year's upcoming General Assembly (GA) in Toronto will have their hands full with a plethora of captivating speakers.

After all, the GA, which runs from November 13 to 15 at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre, is the largest annual Jewish conference in the world.

But how can someone visiting Toronto - or even natives of the city themselves - not take advantage of what promises to be one of the best shopping opportunities anywhere?

Well, for the first time, the GA's Global Jewish Marketplace, featuring a Jewish world full of vendors and attractions from Israel, the United States, and of course, this year's host nation, Canada, will open to the entire Toronto community - from 7:30 to 11:00 p.m. - on Saturday November 12, prior to the GA's opening plenary the next day.

Shoppers will be able to take a relaxing stroll down the marketplace's Philanthropist's Alley, or visit Ben Yehuda Street West for Israeli vendors and their handcrafted Judaica, books and CDs. One of the highlights promises to be a selection of crafts, handmade by Ethiopian immigrants now living in Israel.

In addition, the work of Jewish organizations around the world, including UJA Federation's overseas partner agencies, The Jewish Agency for Israel, and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, will be showcased at the marketplace.

To register for the GA, and to find-out more about the Global Jewish Marketplace, visit www.GAtoronto.com or call 416.849.1000

Israeli products and crafts will be highlighted at this year's GA Marketplace.

Campaign 2006 strikes a chord with donors

UJA Federation divisions propel campaign to $35 million

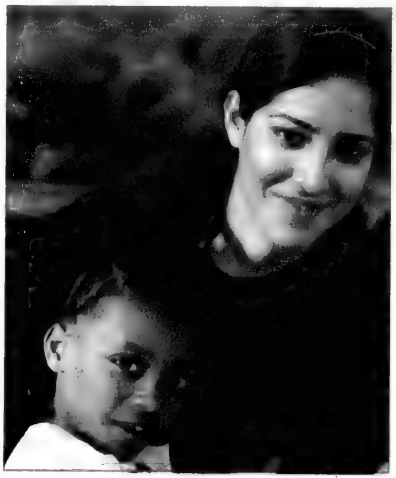
By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

UJA Federation's Campaign 2006, which is focused on helping youth at risk, is clearly hitting a nerve with donors, with more than $35 million already raised.

The campaign, chaired by Honey Sherman and Warren Kimel, highlights three strategic commitments: social justice - assisting the poor and vulnerable; rebuilding Israeli lives after five years of terror; and connecting Jewish youth to Jewish life.

A number of UJA Federation divisions are reporting unprecedented increases in gifts over the same period a year ago.

"We decided that we would run this year's Finance Division as a business, with an eye towards the future," says Daniel Klass, who along with Larry Ullman, are first-time chairs of the division, which has already raised $800,000, an increase of 17 per cent over last year. "We owe a lot of our success to youth. Lauren Harris and Evan Cooperman are chairing our Young Finance Division and the enthusiasm and energy they've brought to the division is unbelievable. They've also attracted a lot of young, first-time donors to the Finance Division, which bodes well for the future."



This year's campaign focuses on youth at risk in Toronto, Israel and around the world.

UJA Federation's Fashion Division has raised $450,000. According to David Weinberg, co-chair of the division with Jon Strauss, its success is based on a natural evolution.

"I've been involved in the Fashion Division for ten years now, and I think this year's success is a combination of factors," he says. "First of all, I think it's an ongoing process whereby we build on the year's previous campaign. We learn as we go, and, eventually, we find the right combination; the right relationship between canvassers and donors. Another important factor in this year's success is the campaign case. With much of our attention going to helping the poor and vulnerable - especially our children - the message is really hitting our donors where they live. We're really connecting with donors this year."

Fly-In offers insight into Washington politics

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

Completely invigorated by the day's events, the 44 participants of this year's UJA Federation Washington Fly-In had by all accounts experienced a unique, vital and exhausting trip to the US capital.

Meeting with dignitaries on Capitol Hill, at two embassies and at AIPAC (The American Israel Public Affairs Committee) all in one day, the participants were enlightened by high profile professionals who are on the front lines of American politics and Middle East policy, working to effect change and influence decision makers.

The Fly-In, chaired by George Grossman and Nathan Lindenberg, began when the private plane carrying the group touched down in Washington D.C. at 8:15 am. The participants were then taken directly to Capitol Hill for a candid briefing on Hurricane Katrina by Mike Hirsch, an official with FEMA (the Federal Emergency Management Agency).

"This was the worst hurricane season I can remember; it's like the third world down there," he explained. "And FEMA dropped the ball. We didn't have the foresight to force people's hands for compulsory evacuation. We needed to be more aggressive, we needed more buses. There was just a lack of disaster relief experience."

The next step was the Canadian Embassy for comments from Jon Allen, who is in charge of political affairs, Ron Brownstein a writer for the LA Times and Barry Swartz, senior vice president of United Jewish Communities, the umbrella organization for Jewish federations.

Then it was off to AIPAC.

"The reason we are so effective in influencing American policy is that we are single minded in our focus," explained political director Bob Bassin. "We actively encourage members of AIPAC to build solid relationships with congressmen, politicians, local governments. It is the operating principal of AIPAC. Relationship building is the key. It is harder to say no to someone you have a relationship with than a total stranger."

"This was an incredible eye-opener," Sheldon Richman, a Fly-In participant said. "To be able to meet people of influence and get such current information has been just fabulous."

"I am so grateful for this wonderful opportunity," said Rachel Koffman, one of four Hillel students selected to participate on the trip. "We've learned so much that will be useful to us back at school."

UJA Federation nurtures Eilat's young leaders

By DVORA WILSHANKSY

Toronto's twinned community in Israel - the Eilat/Eilot Region - is quickly gaining an impressive reputation thanks to the quality and training of its young Jewish leaders.

Twinned through the Jewish Agency of Israel's Partnership 2000 (P2K) initiative, Eilat-Eilot, with the help of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, has seen its Young Leadership Group become a national model for other communities.

Members of the Eilat Young Leadership group.

Its goals include increasing involvement in the local community, promoting volunteerism to meet community needs, and strengthening the connection with Toronto's Jewish community. The group is comprised of approximately 30 volunteer members between the age of 25 and 45.

Cohi Zeno, who has been involved since the Eilat YL group's inception five years ago, explains that the group recently completed a project to collect school supplies for needy children in Eilat. "We received lists of needy children directly from the schools, and collected as much as we could," she said. "Another project started when the principal of Toronto's Bialik School visited the Joseftal Hospital in Eilat. He returned to Toronto and raised funds from Bialik, which were sent to Israel. With the assistance of the Eilat YL Group, televisions are being purchased for patients in the hospital."

The group recently hosted the first P2K Young Leadership National Conference, which was attended by 170 volunteers from leadership groups in 23 different partnership regions throughout Israel.

Conference participants learned about leadership, fundraising, ties with the Diaspora, recruitment and maintenance of volunteers and initiating community projects.

"We are proud that Eilat's Young Leadership Group does so much within the local community, and also with its partners in Toronto," said Eilat Mayor, Meir Yitzhak Halevy. "It's very gratifying that Eilat's group is serving as a role model to other communities around the country."

Beth Radom honours longtime members

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

People who have been members of Beth Radom Congregation for 50 years or more were recently honoured at a luncheon held at the shul.

Beth Radom's origins are in the Radomer Mutual Benefit Society. The society was founded by a group of Radomers from Poland and chartered in 1925 to assist needy Jews in Toronto, and as a co-operative credit association.

After the war, in 1950, a group of survivors from Radom organized B'nai Radom. In 1962, the Radomer Mutual Benefit Society, in partnership with B'nai Radom, founded the conservative Beth Radom Congregation at its present location at 18 Reiner Rd.

Beth Radom is lucky to have more than 50 members who have been with the synagogue for at least 50 years, said Raul Knoll, the chair and organizer of the luncheon. Some 40 longtime members attended the event with members of their families.

Rabbi Steven Schonblum said "it is an honour and a privilege to be associated with a synagogue that has so many 50-year members and has been part of this great community in which I was born and raised."

The rabbi congratulated the members for their "devotion and dedication to Yiddishkeit" and noted that they have belonged to Beth Radom "six years longer than I was born."

He added that Beth Radom has a bright and positive future. "You must continue to work with the younger members," he said.

Entertainment at the event included a performance by Ben Silverberg, the cantor of Shaar Shalom Synagogue, singing such favourites as Yossel Yossel, Yism'chu, Tumbalaleika and Adon Olam.

CHAT grad wins Waldman scholarship

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Dennis Waldman Foundation for Jewish Education has given another promising student a scholarship in honour of a beloved teacher who died suddenly at the age of 41.

This year, Leora Jackson, a recent graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto with an academic average of more than 90 per cent, won the annual $2,500 award.

When Dennis Waldman, a junior high teacher at Associated Hebrew Schools, passed away in 1989, his family and friends established a trust in his honour to contribute to the education of Jewish youth in the community.

"Over the years, we've had an amazing array of young people win the award. It's been gratifying to all of us – family and friends – who've been involved in it," said Nell Waldman, Dennis' widow.

The non-profit organization provides scholarships for students who are completing high school with the intention of going on to a post-secondary education.

To win, applicants must demonstrate involvement in the Jewish community, as well as supply an essay, proof of academic achievement, teacher references, a list of extracurricular activities and service to the community.

Jackson, who is studying science in her first year at Queen's University, impressed the foundation's board of directors with her many accomplishments.

WEAPONS OF THE SPIRIT: LE CHAMBON-SUR-LIGNON

A CONSPIRACY OF GOODNESS

Thursday, October 27 – 7:30 pm

Temple Sinai
210 Wilson Avenue, Toronto

A tiny Protestant farming village in the mountains of south-central France, Le Chambon-sur-Lignon, probably means very little to our community. Yet, citizens of that small town played a pivotal role in the lives of 5,000 Jews in grave danger during the Holocaust. By defying the Nazis and providing the Jews with a safe haven, they, too, placed themselves at great risk.

Pierre Sauvage (center) with Righteous Among the Nations Marie Brottes and Henri Héritier at the Le Chambon premiere of Weapons of the Spirit.

PIERRE SAUVAGE, a child survivor of the Holocaust and Emmy Award-winning filmmaker, will retell the story of these courageous villagers, using excerpts from his documentary Weapons of the Spirit. Born to produce this film, Mr. Sauvage was himself one of those saved in Le Chambon.

Mr. Sauvage is the founder of the Chambon Foundation, whose mission is to explore and communicate, especially on film, the lessons of hope intertwined with the Holocaust's lessons of despair.

HELPING THE HELPLESS:

SURVIVAL IN THE NAZI ERA

Saturday, October 29 – 7:30 pm

St. John's Norway Anglican Church
470 Woodbine Ave, Toronto

What are the circumstances that prompt some people to help others? Perhaps no one is better suited to answer that question than SISTER RENATE SEEBASS, an Anglican nun from the Convent of the Holy Name in Derby, England.

In April 1945, two young Jewish men, fleeing from the Langenstein-Zwieberge concentration camp in Germany, found themselves at the home of Pastor Julius Seebass. Despite the risk to their own lives, he and his family took them in and nursed them back to health. Daughter Renate was so moved by the rescue that, after the War, she moved to England where she became an Anglican nun.

PROFESSOR MONA SUE WEISSMARK, daughter of Adolph Weissmark, one of the two men rescued, will present a brief video about this heartwarming story and speak about her father's experience.

Guest Voice

By MURRAY TEITEL

In 1941, Joseph Ratzinger, age 14, joined the Hitler Youth. Two years later, he was enrolled in an anti-aircraft unit that protected a BMW factory making aircraft engines. The workforce included slaves from Dachau concentration camp. Following that he was sent to Hungary, where he set up tank traps and saw Jews being herded to death camps. None of this would be attracting scrutiny 64 years later had Ratzinger not become Pope Benedict XVI on April 19.

Just three months into his term, Pope Benedict condemned a spate of terror attacks in England, Iraq, Turkey and Egypt, without mentioning one that occurred on June 12 in Netanya, Israel, that killed four Israelis and wounded 70 others. When Israel, which on a per capita basis has lost more civilians to terrorist attacks than any other country on earth, protested this omission, Vatican spokesperson Joaquin Navarro-Valls said the Pope was referring only to recent attacks. When it was realized that the British bombing had preceded the Israeli, the Vatican clarified the remark, stating: "Not every attack against Israel could be followed by an immediate public condemnation. There are various reasons for this, among them the fact that attacks against Israel were sometimes followed by immediate Israeli reactions not always compatible with the norms of international law. It would, consequently, have been impossible to condemn the former and remain silent on the latter."

This was a nice try, but it didn't work. Israel's policy of surgical strikes against only those responsible for the attacks is a more benign response to terrorism than that adopted by the United States and Britain, whose invasion of Iraq has so far resulted in the deaths of 25,000 civilians. Egypt and Turkey torture suspects, often to death. But even if that was not the case, are Israelis victims less worthy of sympathy because of the means their government employs to protect its citizens? Does Catholic teaching not stress that all humans, including Israelis at a Netanya shopping mall, are created in the likeness of God?

But before we jump to the conclusion that Pope Benedict dislikes Jews – after all, membership in the Hitler Youth was at the time compulsory – let us examine a more likely explanation for his unfortunate remarks. This explanation is rooted in the history of the Catholic Church.

Nazism was abhorrent to the Catholic Church. But Nazism sprouted in a field prepared for almost two millennia by Catholicism. During this time, it was the policy of the Vatican to denigrate, persecute and demonize Jews to prove that the Jews have incurred God's displeasure for not recognizing Jesus as His son and their saviour. This was supposed to demonstrate that Catholicism was true and Judaism false.

Prior to World War II, Civilta Catholica, a Jesuit publication functioning as the unofficial Vatican mouthpiece, decried the pernicious influence of Jews on society and advocated ghettoization. It approved of the Nazi treatment of Jews, while lamenting that it was motivated by barbarism rather than faith. Pope Pius XII, fully aware of the mass murder of millions of Jews as it was taking place, never publicly uttered a word of condemnation. And Leon Berard, Vichy ambassador to the Holy See, after enquiring as to how the Vatican viewed his government's anti-Jewish racial laws, was able to report: "They have no quarrel with our statute."

For men of such a mindset, the rebirth of the State of Israel in 1948 must have been problematic. If God hates the Jews for not recognizing the one true religion, why is he favouring them by returning them to their ancient home? It could be said that the Church went into denial.

Pope Paul VI, visiting Christian holy sites in Israel in January 1964, acted as if Israel was not a country. He never referred to the state by name, nor to its president by his title. He refused the mandatory foreign-dignitary visit to the Holocaust memorial, Yad Vashem, and would not meet either of Israel's chief rabbis.

It would not be until the 45th year of Israel's existence that the Vatican finally agreed to establish diplomatic relations with it. This happened during the papacy of Pope John Paul II, whose visit to Israel in 2000 could not have contrasted more with Paul VI's. According to Jewish custom, he placed a kvitil (a prayer on piece of paper) in between stones of the Western Wall. He prayed to the God of Abraham and, in a sign of great respect, called Judaism Christianity's older brother.

Ratzinger, by contrast, upset many Jews with a statement in 1987 that Jewish history and scripture reach fulfilment only in Christ. In 2000, he signed a document, Dominus Jesus, in which he argued that only in the Catholic Church is there eternal salvation. The rebirth of a Jewish state in the land of Jesus is inconsistent with the theological chauvinism of Benedict XVI. Like Paul VI, who visited Israel pretending it didn't exist, Ratzinger, in omitting Jewish terror victims, was voicing his religious problem with the fact of Israel's existence. If during his papacy he gets his way, we can expect to see a retreat from the beginnings of legitimacy his predecessor bestowed on Judaism and a Vatican foreign policy both irrationally critical of Israel and undeservedly supportive of those countries that would destroy it.

Then again he might not get his way. As historian Michael Marrus has pointed out, the Vatican is a bit like a university. The president doesn't necessarily get his way. The Church hierarchy is made up of many individuals who do not agree on everything. I would not be surprised if there are even some who believe Vatican II was a mistake and Jews should never have been absolved of guilt for the death of Christ. There are probably others who believe (what not too long ago would have seen them burned alive) that Catholicism is but one way among others to God.

That's how it goes with the Catholic Church. Sometimes it is one step forward and two steps back and sometimes it is one step back and two steps forward. Never underestimate the capacity of the Church to move forward – albeit at a glacial pace.

Jewish Life

Sukkot: not an ancient relic

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

With the passing of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, the calendar immediately involves us with the holiday of Sukkot. The ancient symbols of this holiday seem out of place in a modern world. Jewish law commands us to spend some time in a sukkah, a temporary makeshift dwelling. The historical association of dwelling in a sukkah, just as the Israelites dwelled in booths in the desert, is the reason usually offered for constructing such an odd structure. But why is it important for us to live as they did? Why do we want to mirror ancient Israel's living conditions? What is the significance?

Another seemingly strange symbol, the taking of a lulav and an etrog into our hands and making special blessings on them, also seems irrelevant in a modern world. Someone once asked me why Jews walk around with a lemon and a bush during Sukkot. We are no longer an agricultural nation, so why do we continue to carry seemingly meaningless agricultural symbols?

Although it seems that the acts of dwelling in booths and blessing the lulav and etrog are meaningless, one need not look far for their significance.

The Torah has instructed us to construct, once a year, a dwelling whose main defining feature is that it not be permanent. In fact, Jews should leave their permanent dwellings as often as possible to spend time in this flimsy structure. Why such an odd request? The answer may lie within another ancient text.

The rabbis in the Mishnah stated that you must never begin to judge another person until you have arrived in their place. For one week each year, we arrive in the place of the homeless. For one week, we scratch the surface of what life must be like for those whose home is never permanent. We have been forced into this position by Divine decree – circumstances beyond our control.

Each of us encounters homeless individuals on the streets of our cities. We are quick to judge them as being responsible for their circumstances – surely they are lazy or guilty of substance abuse. Perhaps dwelling in a sukkah will remind us that they may have arrived on the street through circumstances beyond their control. If we are lucky, the booths have given us perspective.

Blessing the lulav and the etrog can also teach us much beyond agricultural cycles. The midrash states that the etrog symbolizes Abraham, the palm branches symbolize Isaac, the "boughs of thick trees" symbolize Jacob and the willows symbolize Joseph. One is not surprised to see the patriarchs embodied within such an important ritual. However, the same midrash continues to say that the etrog equally symbolizes Sarah, the palm branches symbolize Rebeccah, the "boughs of thick trees"symbolize Leah and the willows symbolize Rachel. The lulav and the etrog stand for many things, and among them are both our patriarchs and our matriarchs.

If we view Sukkot as an agricultural relic from our past, the symbols become obsolete and are easily dismissed. If we allow ourselves to experience the holiday, and not just commemorate it, we open up the possibility of gaining humility and balance.

Sukkot, Shmini Atzeret and rain

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

We are well into the holiday of Sukkot and as Jews dine and entertain under a canopy of branches, they check the skies for threatening clouds. Ironic, because this Tuesday, Shmini Atzeret, we recite a special prayer, for rain. Today, the relationship between this holiday season, rain, water and the Jews.

As Amnon Bazak points out in Sukkot and the Attributes of Justice, rain is often seen in the Torah as a blessing and its absence, a curse. If the people of Israel turn away to serve other gods, "the anger of God will burn against you, and He will shut up the heavens and you will have no rain" (Deuteronomy 11:17). But if the nation listens to God's commandments, then "I shall give the rain of your land in its time; the early rain and the late rain" (Deuteronomy 11:14). [http://tinyurl.com/bwzwh]

Sukkot itself is tied closely to water. One of the happiest ceremonies in Jewish tradition took place during this holiday. While the Temple was standing, a special water-pouring ceremony called Simchat Bet HaShoavah was held on Sukkot. The drawing of the water was performed with such intense joy that the following saying remains a testament: "He who has not seen the rejoicing at the Simchat Bet HaShoavah, has never seen rejoicing in his life." [www.ou.org/chagim/sukkot/libations.htm]

The Babylonian Talmud presents a dramatic narrative of the ceremony, which brings to life the joy, music and elation of the times: Men of piety dancing, countless Levites playing on harps and trumpets; the sounding of the shofar at dawn; and Rabban Shimon ben Gamliel, who "would take eight burning torches in one hand and toss them upwards; he tossed one and caught one, and never did one touch the other." [http://sukkot.123holiday.net/ sukkot_story3.html]

And while we're thinking about drawing water with joy, now's the perfect time to listen to the most famous song on the topic, Mayim, Mayim. The song draws its lyrics from Isaiah 12:3, "With joy you will draw water from the wells of deliverance." You can listen to the tune [http://tinyurl.com/8zgr9] and check out the choreography notation. [www.recfd.com/dancenotes/mayim.htm]

The Tel Shemesh website draws another parallel between Sukkot and water. "Interestingly, the mitzvah of sukkah dwelling and the mitzvah of mikvah, or ritual immersion, are the only two mitzvahs that we do with our entire bodies, and both have to do with water, either real or symbolic… [http://tinyurl.com/9fz75] (I wonder if we might add donning a tallit as a third mitzvah that we do with our entire bodies, although it's not as all-encompassing as entering a sukkah or being immersed in a mikvah.)

Jason Elbaum takes the water theme full circle. He suggests that as much as Sukkot, which ushers in the rainy season, is drawn to water, Passover, at the beginning of Israel's dry season, is practically phobic toward the liquid. Just think about what happens to matzah if it stays moist too long as it's being baked! To understand why these holidays have such diverging takes on water, read his article, the Sukkot-Passover Rain Continuum. [http://tinyurl.com/avq2h]

Once Sukkot is over, Jews pray for a fall and winter blessed with plenty of rain in the Land of Israel. Tefilat Geshem is a beautiful prayer that shows how crucial water has been to the heroes of the Torah. For example: "Remember the one [Moses] drawn forth in a bulrush basket from the water. They said, 'He drew water and provided the sheep with water.' At the time, Your treasured people thirsted for water, he struck the rock and out came water. For the sake of his righteousness, grant abundant water!" The prayer ends with the entire congregation praying "For a blessing, not a curse. For life and not for death. For abundance, not for famine." [http://tinyurl.com/a8wr9]

And from that day until Passover in the spring, Jews continue to pray for rain three times each weekday.

Have their prayers been heard? It may not always be easy to tell. But you can get a fairly good idea if you go to the Israel Meteorological Service website and check out the latest forecast. [www.ims.gov.il/index_en.htm]

Democratization: Is It For Real?

Democratization of previously undemocratic or tyrannical societies is an idea in the air and an emerging reality in places on the ground. For some, this phenomenon is revolutionary and important; for others, democratization is American hubris at its worst. This series, featuring some of the most compelling voices of our time, examines this explosive and significant issue.

Torontonian collects, ships used clothing to Israel

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Three organizations, in Canada and Israel, are working together to assist victims of terror and their families in Israel, "sharing the mitzvah."

Clothing for Israel is a local good used-clothing collection project that was founded by Toronto volunteer Ellie Korenblum. Clothing for Israel and Yad Eliezer, which has been distributing the clothing to the needy in Israel, will now work with OneFamily Fund. The Fund will distribute clothing to accommodate increased needs in Israel. Now that several 1,000-bag containers of clothing are being sent to Israel each year, OneFamily Fund will share the contents of the containers with Yad Eliezer.

"With this project," says Korenblum, "we are all sharing the mitzvah."

In Israel, the clothing is either free or sold for a small token payment at a gemach, which is similar to a thrift shop.

Korenblum started Clothing for Israel after she sent her late father's clothing to Israel 20 years ago and discovered that there is a need for used clothing there.

Over the years, more and more people learned about her project by word of mouth and approached her to donate clothing. The project grew in leaps and bounds until a depot was required.

"Philip Davidovits, who is in the Bathurst-Glencairn area, offered to store the enormous amounts of clothing being dropped off," says Korenblum.

"And five years ago, through the efforts of Naomi Pinczower, who made 2,000 flyers which she distributed to Bais Yaakov and Eitz Chaim schools, other schools and the community became aware of the need and the project catapulted."

Korenblum says that the next container will be shipped to Israel early this month.

OneFamily Fund helps victims of terror, providing for their immediate and long-term needs, including financial help, emotional support, psychological and medical care, legal help, job retraining and basic love and attention. More than 70 per cent of the families of victims of terror live below the poverty line.

Pam Albert, the Canadian director of OneFamily, worked as a volunteer for the organization for several years after she visited Israel. "I looked for an organization that assisted victims of terror in a tangible, concrete and ongoing basis and didn't just send money," she says.

Local volunteer Ellie Korenblum, left, collects good used clothing for needy Israelis and Pam Albert is the Canadian director of OneFamily, which distributes the clothing in Israel. [Cynthia Gasner photo]

Marc and Chantal Belzberg, founders of OneFamily Fund, asked Albert to form a Canadian branch of the organization.

Albert says that OneFamily involves all the members of a family in their projects. "We have an obligation to provide a living example of giving back… in Israel," she says.

For information, or to drop off good used clothing to be shipped to Israel, call 647-892-5174.

Less desirable clothing can be donated to the local bikur cholim,which is raising funds to facilitate their chesed. Call Caroline Zahler, 416-782-5015.

For information about the OneFamily Fund, call 416-644-4955.

Jeweller retires after 37 years

By LARA GREENBERG
Special to The CJN

He started Samuel Kleinberg Jewellers in 1968 and now, Samuel (Sam) Kleinberg has announced his retirement.

Since the announcement, Kleinberg says that people have come into the store to thank him for his jewelry and to make "one last purchase" or have "one last chat."

Samuel Kleinberg

Over the past 37 years, Samuel Kleinberg Jewellers has become somewhat of an institution for Torontonians.

"Customers are the key to this business, and the special elements we have provided for them are the product itself, the quality of our work and our service," said Kleinberg.

He finds it difficult to name his favourite piece of jewelry over the years. "There have just been so many pieces," he said.

Much of the jewelry Kleinberg sells is custom-made. He says that he has always enjoyed designing jewelry according to the taste of the customer. As well, most of the jewelry featured in the store is made by Kleinberg Jewellers.

Through another branch of the business, from 1981 until a little earlier this year, Samuel Kleinberg Jewellers provided a manufacturing service for other stores in Canada and the United States.

The store has only ever been in one location, on Bathurst Street near Lawrence.

The seventy-two-year-old Kleinberg, who hopes to retire by the end of the year, was motivated to end his jewelry career due to his age and health. He also wants to spend more time with his wife, children and grandchildren.

He is a keen sportsman who enjoys playing golf, tennis and racquetball, and with a bit more time on his hands, he hopes to have more time for his sports.

Kleinberg is also looking forward to being able to travel. Over the years, he has travelled a lot for business but never had a chance to visit a destination as a tourist. His goal now is to go on a tour of Australia and Africa.

At the moment, plans for the future of the store are unknown. There are, as yet, no plans for anyone to take over the business and Kleinberg is not sure that the store will even carry on.

His main focus of the moment is on liquidating his merchandise. "I've never conducted a sale before. Now I need to in order to raise money for my retirement," he said.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Sharing some Moroccan traditions

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Esther Benaim, co-owner of Great Cooks On Eight, a cooking school housed at The Bay downtown, grew up in Morocco eating salsa without knowing what it was.

"My mother would finely chop cucumbers, tomatoes, onions and parsley and serve it in a vinaigrette. It was salsa before its time," says Benaim, who has lived in Canada for more than 40 years.

"Every culture has some version of the same food. It's hard to know how dishes travel across cultures."

Her mother, who was born in Portugal but whose family is from Morocco, still helps out at the school. "She has her own version of a lot of 'traditionally' Jewish foods. The whole matzah ball thing is new to her. She takes chicken and then she adds lots of beans. It's chicken soup with a Moroccan twist.

"Moroccan foods are full of flavours such as cumin, cinnamon, paprika and saffron. We still use them at home to liven up food because our family likes to keep up our traditions. It gives character to the food."

A typical holiday chicken dish would be stewed rather than roasted, she says. "It's done on top of the stove with lemon and olives, or prunes and almonds.

"Our version of gefilte fish is a fish ball, usually made of white fish. It's a little 'tomatoey', peppery and garlicy and it's mildly spiced."

Their meals always involve some sort of salads, either raw or cooked, she says. "There's always a good assortment – carrot salad, roasted pepper salad or the Moroccan 'salsa.' We also serve lots of vegetable soups."

Benaim, a member of the Women's Culinary Network, says if she had to name a typically Moroccan dish, "it would definitely be couscous. It is often a dish by itself. There is a sweet version with sugar and cinnamon, or we may serve a huge couscous platter with a separate bowl of vegetables and broth.

Esther Benaim

"The couscous goes through about three steams and then it is fluffed. If it's steamed on top of meat, it will take on that flavour. Traditionally, we bring a couscous dish when someone moves to a new house."

As with every culture, she says, Moroccans project their love through food. "At my mother's house, everyone has to eat. There is no such thing as visiting and not being fed. The mint tea is also essential. When people come to visit, they often hang out in the kitchen.

"When our family really gets lucky, my mother will bake a white bread with an egg crust. It's golden in colour and topped with sesame seeds.

"She also makes pastelles, a fried potato dish filled with meat. They're a lot like potato knishes, and they're an important holiday food."

Benaim offers the following recipes:

SEVEN VEGETABLE SOUP

4 stalks swiss chard, use mostly white part and a bit of green leaf
1 quince peeled, cored and cut into quarters
1 lb. Chinese winter melon or zucchini peeled and cut into cubes
1 rutabaga peeled and cut into cubes
2 leeks white part only, cut into small pieces
1 small butternut squash peeled and cut into cubes
½ small white cabbage cut into pieces
2 veal bones, with marrow
2 tsp. salt
1 tsp. white pepper
a few threads of saffron

Place all vegetables and bones in a soup pot and cover with cold water. Bring to a boil. Add salt, pepper and saffron.

Turn heat down and let simmer, covered, till all vegetables are soft. Remove veal bones. Using a hand blender, puree all ingredients. Adjust seasoning and the soup is ready to serve. Serves 4-6.

GRATED CARROT SALAD

1 lb. carrots
½ cup raisins – soak in a bit of orange juice for ½ hour.
½ cup orange juice
½ cup olive oil
salt and pepper to taste
1 tbsp. vinegar or lemon juice
fresh parsley, chopped

Food Scrumptious Food

'Every culture has some version of same food'

Wash, peel and coarsely grate the carrots. Add soaked raisins. Mix orange juice, oil, vinegar, salt and pepper. Add to carrots and sprinkle with chopped parsley. Serves 4-6.

PAPRIKA OIL

My mother always has a jar of this in the cupboard.

2 cups vegetable oil
1 cup paprika

Mix oil and paprika in a jar and keep for at least a day before using. This does not have to be refrigerated. Shake before using.

COOKED PEPPER AND TOMATO SALAD

10 peppers, red and green
8-10 tomatoes or 1 large can, seeded and chopped
4 cloves garlic, chopped
1 tsp. salt or to taste
1/2 cup paprika oil

Grill and peel the peppers. Remove seeds and cut peppers into small pieces. Set aside. Gently sautée garlic. Add the tomatoes and gently cook, uncovered, for 15-20 minutes. Add paprika oil, and roasted peppers and season with salt.

Continue to simmer uncovered over low heat until all the juice is absorbed. This should take about 2 hours. Stir often, especially as salad thickens. Serve hot, cold or at room temperature.

FISH TANGINE WITH TOMATOES

4 halibut or grouper steaks
1 hot banana pepper
2 red or green peppers, sliced
1 large tomato, sliced
1/2 cup chopped coriander
6 whole garlic cloves
1/4 cup paprika oil
salt

Preheat oven to 350. Place a layer of sliced tomatoes in a shallow baking dish. Place fish slices on tomatoes then top with the pepper slices. Add coriander and garlic cloves. Drizzle with paprika oil. Season with salt.

Cover with foil and bake for about 45 minutes. Uncover and continue cooking for another 10-15 minutes, till juices evaporate.

Former Israeli ambassador to Ethiopia recalls Operation Solomon

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Tunisian-born Asher Naim served as an Israeli diplomat for 42 years, holding ambassadorial posts around the world. But the highlight of his diplomatic career, he said, came while he was Israeli ambassador to Ethiopia from 1990-92.

It was Operation Solomon in May 1991, the dramatic rescue of Ethiopia's Jewish community over a period of 36 hours.

Now retired from the diplomatic service, Naim was in Winnipeg last month as part of a cross-Canada speaking tour, and spoke about Ethiopia to the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's Combined Jewish Appeal Young Adult Division

Ethiopia, he said, is a unique country. It has a 3,000-year history and its own language and culture that are distinct from any those of any other country or region in Africa. Ethiopia was an empire when Europe was still a backwater. And the country remained independent even after most of the rest of Africa was divided up among the European powers in the 1880s.

Naim spoke about how Christian missionaries discovered Ethiopian Jewry in the late 19th century, and described the Falashas' first contacts with European Jewry, stressing the discrimination they faced and the poverty in which they lived. Modern conveniences and technology were entirely foreign to them before they arrived in Israel.

"In just over three hours [the time it took to fly from Ethiopia to Israel], they went from a society living 700 years in the past to the modern world," he said.

Asher Naim played a pivotal role in that transformation.

Haile Selassie, the longtime emperor of Ethiopia, consistently refused to let his Jewish subjects leave for Israel. In 1974, he was overthrown by a brutal military leader, Mengistu Haile Mariam, who was propped up for years by the former Soviet Union. When the Soviet Union collapsed in 1989, Mariam turned to Israel for help. Naim said that since Israel was willing to pay $1,000 per person to bring Romanian Jews to Israel, Mariam felt they would also be willing to pay for Ethiopian Jews.

While Israel was unwilling to provide Mariam with weapons, the government of the Jewish state was willing to maintain a dialogue with him. Naim, as Israel's ambassador to Ethiopia, was in frequent contact with the dictator.

"We would propose economic projects, and for each proposal, he would let 1,000 Jews out of the country," Naim said. "By March 1991, though, the rebels were closing in on Addis Ababa. We felt that the 14,000 remaining Jews in the country would be in danger and decided to take them all out."

Asher Naim

After three weeks of bargaining, Mariam agreed to let all the Jews go in return for $35 million. The money was pledged by Jewish community leaders at a meeting in New York. The morning the money was to be delivered, Mariam fled the country.

"Because the Americans had persuaded the rebels and the government to call a truce for four days to try negotiations, we had that time period to take everyone out," Naim said. "Our [Israel's] air force said it would be no problem."

The unforeseen problem, however, was that after word went out to the Jews to come to the Israeli Embassy to be evacuated, 35,000 people showed up. "We had to spend a few precious hours determining who was Jewish and eligible to go," Naim recalled.

Still, Operation Solomon was flawless in its execution. At a diplomatic reception given by the Greek ambassador after the operation was completed and became public knowledge, Naim said he enjoyed outlining in great detail to the Arab ambassadors present how well the Israel Air Force had performed. He also recalled that the Ethiopian foreign minister stormed in and asked how he could become Jewish, too.

"The essence of Operation Solomon is that we are our brothers' keepers," Naim said. "That is part of what being Jewish is all about."

Naim's involvement with Ethiopian Jewry did not end with Operation Solomon. He and six other former Israeli ambassadors raise funds to send Ethiopian youngsters to schools of higher learning.

"We started with five students and now support 270," he said. "Education is the key to integrating Ethiopians into Israeli society."

Naim's appearance was part of the Young Adult Division's CJA campaign kickoff and part of its Israel Awareness programming. Last year, the division raised $270,000. This year, YAD has raised $98,000 in the first month of the campaign.

Russian Jews replace Argentines as source of immigrants coming to Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The influx of Argentine Jews that has reinvigorated Winnipeg's Jewish community over the last half decade has slowed considerably this year, but Russian families from Israel filled the void in the first six months of 2005.

And it's largely word of mouth that seems to be attracting growing numbers of them to Manitoba's capital.

"We are not soliciting immigrants from Israel [as the community did in Buenos Aires as part of its Grow Winnipeg initiative]," said Evelyn Hecht, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's immigration officer. "They are approaching us."

Michael and Alesia Smoliak and their young daughters arrived here in late June, while Valeri and Marina Lvovsky and their two sons came in early July.

Both Marina Lvovsky and Michael Smoliak said they came to Winnipeg because they have friends in the city.

Originally from Leningrad (now called St. Petersburg), Smoliak had been living in Israel for the past 15 years. His wife had been in Israel for 10 years.

"Winnipeg seems to be a nice place," he said. "The climate is the same as Russia. I missed the snow."

Smoliak, an electronic engineer by training, has found work in a factory, while his wife is a cook in a hotel.

The Lvovskys are originally from Ukraine and had been living in Israel for 11 years. Like Smoliak, Valeri Lvovsky trained as an (industrial) engineer. He is currently working as a computerized machine operator.

Hecht said 61 Jewish families immigrated to Winnipeg in the first six months of the year. Their number includes 59 children and 108 adults. Twelve of the families are from South America (including two from Venezuela) while the rest are Russian Jews from Israel.

Winnipeg's Jewish population stands at about 15,000, up from about 14,700 in 2001. At the community's height in 1961, some 19,400 Jews lived in the city.

In the last five years, approximately 100 families, or about 500 people, have come to Winnipeg from Argentina, which experienced a severe economic crisis from 1999 to 2002.

"Conditions in Argentina have improved," Hecht said. "And some prospective immigrants from Buenos Aires don't have the money to come."

While the Argentine immigrants have blended into Winnipeg's Jewish community fairly quickly, Hecht said, it's too early to tell how this new group of Russian Israelis will fare.

"Many Russian Israeli families that came here earlier came either because they had job offers or they came through the [provincially sponsored] Manitoba nominee program [for skilled workers]," she said.

"Many of them couldn't speak English when they arrived, and that has held them back. As a result of new regulations introduced on June 1, 2004, the newer immigrants have a much better command of English. So they should have an easier time adjusting."

She added that a number of other Israelis are coming in on short-term contracts and have approached Jewish community institutions for assistance with schooling and other matters.

"We have no advance warning about these other Israelis," Hecht said. "It is putting quite a strain on the federation's resources."

She foresees a steady stream of new Jewish immigrants coming for the rest of this year and beyond.

"We are getting people coming on exploratory visits almost every week," she said.

"We had 12 in September. We have five more scheduled for October, eight for November and six for December."

UN report could put Assad in a tight spot

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Oct. 25 is a much-anticipated date on the Middle Eastern calendar. That's when UN special prosecutor Detlev Mehlis releases his report to the Security Council on the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri last February.

It's widely anticipated that he will deal with Syria's involvement.

Several weeks ago, Mehlis's investigation resulted in Lebanese officials arresting four Beirut-based security chiefs known to be close to Bashar Assad's Syrian regime. This gives credence to the speculation that while Syria has withdrawn its troops from Lebanese soil, many of its intelligence agents remain active in and around Beirut.

The Sept. 29 Economist article "Bashar Assad is in a pickle, and has no easy way out" says: "Whoever it does turn up, Mr. Mehlis's investigation, backed by the clout of the UN Security Council, will deeply embarrass Syria's government. Should there be proof of complicity or worse [in Hariri's assassination], and should Syria fail to hand over suspects for trial, Mr. Assad's government is sure to be punished by further isolation and an internationalization of sanctions that are now unilaterally imposed by America."

Assuming the investigation implicates Syrian agents, the Economist gives several possible outcomes for the Assad regime:

- Assad may be forced to put some of his advisers on trial.
- Assad may have to yield to U.S. demands, including closing the border to prevent insurgents from reaching Iraq, and ending support for the Iranian-backed Hezbollah terrorist organization, as required by UN Security Council Resolution 1559.
- Assad might be replaced, possibly in a military coup, either by elements of Syria's dominant Sunni population or by someone from Assad's own Alawite community. (The Alawites make up just 15 per cent of Syria's population, but they have long ruled the country.)

Already, Assad has become an isolated and weakened figure in the Arab world. This may account for his continuing close ties with Iran. (Assad's father Hafez supported Iran during its long war with Iraq in the 1980s.)

In "Syrian-Iranian alliance starting to grow stronger," (Winnipeg Free Press, Oct. 4), Samuel Segev writes about the "alarming" Syrian and Iranian involvement in Beirut: "The new speaker of Iran's [parliament], Gholam Ali Haddad Adel met [on Oct. 2] in Damascus with the leaders of nine Palestinian terrorist groups, including Hamas and Islamic Jihad. Adel promised enhanced Iranian assistance to the various groups against Israel. He told them that Iran is opposed to any attempt to disarm Hezbollah or the Palestinian groups."

According to Segev, Ahmed Jibril, head of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine – General Command, is a former Syrian army captain with close ties to Syrian intelligence. He has sent forces to Palestinian refugee camps south of Beirut to bolster Hezbollah and further destabilize Lebanon.

Segev writes: "Beirut's political and intellectual elite is either abroad or in hiding," and he notes that Rafik Hariri's son Saad fled to Paris months ago, while prominent anti-Syrian journalists have been badly injured or assassinated.

One aspect of the Hariri assassination that the media have ignored is the surprising lack of conspiracy theories blaming Israel. Some diehard anti-Israel writers in the West, including Robert Fisk and Eric Margolis, did point the finger at Israel after Hariri's murder. But most Lebanese analysts immediately blamed Syria, as did most citizens, resulting in widespread anti-Syria rallies. The arrest of the four Lebanese security officials further underscores this rational reaction, a welcome change in attitude from the usual blame-Israel response to problems within the Arab world.

Scholarships help students get to Israel

By SHERI SHEFA

Jeff Seidel has helped send 466 Jewish students to study in Israel so far this year, and he says he won't stop until he reaches his goal of sending 1,000.

His Old City Center and the Jewish Student Information Centers near Hebrew University in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv University offer $500 scholarships to North American students who want to visit Israel and learn about their Jewish heritage.

Seidel, originally from Chicago but now living in Jerusalem, has been running the information centres for 20 years.

But it wasn't until early this year that he initiated a scholarship program.

"[I want] to help Jewish students learn about their background and make a connection to the land of Israel," Seidel said.

Any post-secondary student who is accepted into a three- to four-week Jewish studies course at a Jewish school in Israel is eligible, he said.

Whether applicants return to North America after the four-week course or remain at an Israeli university to study for a year has no bearing on their chances to receive the $500 scholarship, which is meant to be used for a plane ticket to Israel, he added.

Applications are accepted all year round. For more information, visit www.jeffseidel.com.

David and Carol Matas hold a joint book launch

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — David Matas credits his fellow author – and first cousin – Carol Matas, with the idea of having their first joint book launch.

"It seemed like a good idea," David says. "Our books were coming out at about the same time and we would be inviting much the same people."

"Our books have the same themes," Carol adds. "And David had already set the time and date."

Thus, David and Carol Matas jointly launched their new books, Aftershock and Turned Away respectively, at a downtown Winnipeg bookstore recently.

The two authors work in different genres. Carol Matas' forte is fiction – much of it Jewish themed – aimed at upper elementary and high school students. She began writing more than 25 years ago as a way to fill in time between acting assignments. Her first novels were science fiction. Her books have been translated and sold in several European countries, including France, Spain, Sweden and Denmark.

Matas' first novel was Lisa's War, an account of the rescue of Denmark's Jewish community during the war as told through the eyes of a teenage Danish Jewish girl. Matas learned about that heroic chapter of World War II from her husband's family. (Her husband, university drama teacher Per Brask, is originally from Denmark.)

Her most successful Holocaust-themed book has been Daniel's Story, which she was commissioned to write for the opening of the Holocaust Museum in Washington.

Matas' latest book, Turned Away, is a more ambitious book that is part Holocaust and part war story. She says it was inspired by Canada's sorry record of turning back Jewish refugees from Europe before and during the war.

"I go into schools and talk to kids about the Holocaust," she says.

"I find that Canadian children have no idea about Canada's terrible record in refusing entry to Jewish refugees. The kids think all the bad stuff happened overseas and that Canada was innocent."

Turned Away is set in Winnipeg in December 1941. The central character is a 12-year-old Jewish girl whose brothers are serving in the Canadian armed forces. One is in the Royal Canadian Air Force, while the other is a member of the Grenadiers. They are stationed in Hong Kong on the eve of the Japanese capture of the British colony.

The girl's family is attempting to bring to Canada cousins in Paris without success, despite ongoing lobbying and the efforts of Jewish communal organizations. "There were a large number of Jewish children in France during the war who had Canadian visas," Matas says. "All were denied entry."

Turned Away is part of Scholastic Canada's Dear Canada series of historical novels for older children. "No one had done a World War II novel in the series," says Matas, who has written previous novels for the series. "I thought this was an important story to tell."

A world-renowned campaigner for human rights, David Matas is involved in the fight against anti-Semitism. A lawyer, he specializes in refugee, immigration and human rights cases when not travelling the world investigating the disappearance of World War II Swedish diplomat and hero Raoul Wallenberg, taking on special assignments for the United Nations or attending international conferences. He is the author of several books related to human rights, the rights of refugees and the hunt for Nazi war criminals in Canada.

Aftershock is about the new anti-Semitism. "Anti-Semitism has become respectable again," he says. "There has been a horrific rise in the number of attacks on Jews around the world."

David Matas says that he and Carol signed quite a number of books at the launch. "We bought each other's books as well," he says.

Next month, both of them will be taking to the road to market their new books. They will be starting their national tours in Toronto in early November, at the Jewish Book Fair.

Vancouver Jewish high school gets new building

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Greater Vancouver's co-ed Jewish community high school has a new building.

King David High School (KDHS), opened its doors for the 2005-06 school year on Sept 6 at a facility on West 41st Avenue in the Oakridge section of west Vancouver.

It cost more than $16 million and can accommodate up to 250 students. Construction began in 2004 and finished in time for the school's September opening.

Students come to KDHS from all over Greater Vancouver, including some of the more distant suburbs. Enrolment this year is 137 students in grades 8 to 12, up from 89 last year – an increase of 55 per cent.

The increase exceeded the school's expectations.

"There's no doubt the new building helped to boost our enrolment," said executive director Dan Shmilovitch. "That and the quality of the education we provide, of course."

The new building is fully equipped. In addition to classrooms, it has two science labs, a home economics lab, a music and dance studio, a library, an art room and a computer lab. It also has more than 80 computers on its own network and wireless Internet access throughout the building.

The school is one block east of the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver, and students will use the JCC's facilities for gym classes.

Shmilovitch said the new building replaces an old wood-frame modular one on nearby Baillie Street that was erected by the Maimonides School Society.

KDHS, which was established in the mid-1980s and operated under a number of different names, teaches both Jewish subjects and the regular British Columbia high school academic curriculum. It has 20 staff, 13 full-time and seven part-time. Four teach Judaics.

Shmilovitch said the new building was built because the Vancouver Jewish community needed a first-class high school with modern facilities.

"We wanted a Jewish high school that met or exceeded the standards of students and their families. It had to be equal to or exceed the standards of the other high schools they could choose," he said. "A vibrant, alive high school will help the community grow and prosper."

The building's official opening took place Sept. 25. The Diamond Family Foundation, which purchased the land and financed most of the building's cost, was singled out for special honour.

As well, KDHS' three founding families – Sam and Frances Belzberg, Naomi and Dennis Frankenburg, Evelyn and the late Leon Kahn – were honoured for their longtime dedication to the school.

New Orleans Jewish community communications director describes flood's aftermath

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Adam Bronstone, the director of communications for the New Orleans Jewish community for the past four years, returned to his temporary new office in Baton Rouge, the state capital, last week after a two-week hiatus in Winnipeg.

He had returned to his hometown to lead yom tov services – along with Cantor Arky Berkal – for Congregation Shir Tikvah, a three-year-old Conservative congregation that comes together only for the High Holy Days. While here, he spoke to several Jewish groups about the destruction wrought by Hurricane Katrina.

"There is a greater impact on people when they hear about this kind of thing first hand from someone they know, as compared to simply reading about it in the paper," Bronstone says.

Winnipeg has raised $60,000 for disaster relief

Bronstone also spoke about the disaster in his Congregation Shir Tikvah yom tov sermon.

"People are hard-pressed to know what to say," he says. "It is the kind of situation that is hard to imagine if you're not in it. I am in it and I still find it hard to imagine. Up until two months ago, I was leading a normal life, too."

Bronstone reports that the Winnipeg Jewish community has raised $60,000 for New Orleans disaster relief. Overall, North American Jewish communities have raised over $22 million for the people of New Orleans, he notes.

On his way back south, Bronstone stopped in Minneapolis to speak at a synagogue. He also has speeches scheduled for St. Louis, Columbus, Tucson, New York, Montreal and Toronto. (He will be in Toronto in November for the United Jewish Communities General Assembly.)

"I have good friends in all of those cities who are helping to raise funds," he says.

Bronstone expects to be working out of Baton Rouge's Jewish community offices for at least three or four weeks, with occasional trips to Houston where he originally relocated just prior to the disaster that struck the city on Aug. 29.

"There is a lot of work to do," he says. "We are acting as a bulletin board for people who need housing in New Orleans. We are helping people with financial assistance issues. We are also trying to co-ordinate all the offers of hands-on assistance. People want to help somewhere. We have to figure out where they can be most effective."

Prior to the hurricane, New Orleans had a Jewish population of about 10,000. The community had a long history dating back to the early 19th century.

"Some Jewish members of the community have moved back," Bronstone says. "Others have gone back to look at their homes and assess the damage. Parts of the city are up and running again."

He says he knows of at least 100 families or individuals who aren't going back and he expects the number to grow. "Some families have already registered their children in school in new communities," he says. "After a year away, they are unlikely to return."

Bronstone has been back to his home once to pick up some of his things. "I am going back to get some more stuff," he says, "but I am leaving my clothes and furniture behind because of the smell."

Fast for the victims in Sudan raises awareness

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

In response to the apathetic attitudes of the people of the western world, Students Taking Action Now: Darfur, or STAND, made a statement Oct. 6 when they organized a worldwide fast in an effort to raise awareness about the genocide in Darfur, Sudan.

The premise behind the International Solidarity Fast for Darfur is that the participants were expected to abstain from a meal or a luxury, like a coffee or a chocolate bar, and give the money they saved to STAND representatives who will donate all proceeds to Doctors Without Borders, a charitable organization that provides relief to Darfurian refugees.

Aside from raising money for the cause, the fast was also meant "to send a powerful message that we, the international community, recognize our responsibility to protect the world's populations from humanitarian crises."

Jonathan Laski, the media director for STAND Canada at the University of Toronto, said it is too early to tell how much money was raised, but he is encouraged by the information he received from campus representatives at the University of Western Ontario.

"Western had 250 to 350 students at the rally… and about $350 was raised," he said.

But, this is just one of the more than 100 campuses that participated in the international event.

STAND, in association with Tzedec Hillel and the Innis Residence Community Outreach Committee, presented a lecture at the Innis Residence at U of T by Dr. Norman Epstein and Dr. Acol Dor, co-chairs of Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan.

They gave a historical overview of the conflict in Sudan, and informed the gathering about ways to put pressure on the government to help. Dor also shared her story of escape from Sudan.

Since 2003, the pro-government Arab militia, Janjaweed, has attempted to exert control over a country divided by religious and ethnic backgrounds.

The conflict over land between African farmers and Arabic nomads escalated into a violent war between African guerrilla groups and the Janjaweed.

To date, about 400,000 people have been killed, about two million are displaced, and millions more are suffering from starvation, exposure, and disease. It is feared that the death toll could reach one million if the international community doesn't interfere.

Laski is also excited about the media attention the project has received. MTVU, a channel designed for college and university students that combines news and music, visited 10 American campuses and filmed scenes from the fast.

He said that BBC World has agreed to broadcast that footage in Darfur and Eastern Chad to show them that there are people in North America who care and are making an effort to help.

While Laski recognizes that little can be done without the support of the government, he hopes that the fast will demonstrate the community's willingness to do whatever it takes to resolve the crisis.

He said Jews have a special responsibility to the victims in Darfur.

"We have experienced the worst genocide," said Laski, referring to the Holocaust. "We need to be the first to stand up…We have the opportunity, as well as a responsibility to stop a genocide."

Laski hopes that the fast will educate the participants, stir their emotions and help them connect with active students.

"There is still a lot to be done. Overall, the idea is to educate. You can't have someone advocate unless they know what's going on," he said.

They are still accepting donations through their website, www.darfurfast.org. For more information, visit www.standcanada.org.

Leora Jackson

In addition to responsibilities as yearbook editor-in-chief and head of research for CHAT's Holocaust commemoration committee, she was involved in many extracurricular activities, from singing in the school choir to volunteering as a swim instructor for special needs children.

"She is a most impressive young woman," Waldman said.

Jackson is grateful for the gift.

"Thank you for the opportunity to apply for the scholarship in memory of Mr. Waldman that values community, education and the quest for knowledge," the 18-year-old wrote in her application.

"These are values that are important to me as well."

The deadline to apply for the next award will be established in late April or May 2006.

Deadly attacks in West Bank

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — Two terrorist incidents this week in the West Bank have some Israeli officials warning about a new stage in the five-year-old Palestinian terror campaign against Israel.

Twin drive-by shootings Sunday killed three Israelis in the West Bank and wounded another four. Most of the casualties were teenage settlers trying to hitch rides home.

The Al-Aksa Brigade, a terrorist wing linked to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah faction, claimed responsibility for the attacks, the worst against West Bank settlers in four months.

Israel accused the Palestinians of abusing recent decisions by the Defence Ministry to ease restrictions on movement in the West Bank out of respect for the Ramadan fast month.

"Unfortunately, the Palestinians have exploited these measures in order to carry out these murderous attacks," said David Baker, an official in Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's office.

Sunday's bloodshed was an embarrassment for Abbas, who was slated to travel to Washington for talks with President George W. Bush later this week.

"This is unfortunate. It shouldn't have happened. We should work hard in order to prevent this from happening," Palestinian Authority Planning Minister Ghassan Al-Khatib said.

Israel has called on Bush to use the talks with Abbas to demand a Palestinian Authority crackdown on terrorists in the West Bank and Gaza Strip as required by the "road map" peace plan.

In an effort to head off the criticism, the Palestinian Authority said in the month since Israel withdrew from Gaza its security forces had foiled 17 attempted attacks from the territory and confiscated dozens of rockets and bombs from terrorist groups.

Israel is continuing its own crackdowns in the West Bank

Israel does not dispute that violence emanating from Gaza has abated. But officials warn that the various Palestinian factions have merely shifted their efforts to the West Bank.

"We had no direct intelligence warnings about today's attacks," a senior Israeli security source said, referring to the shootings outside the settlements of Efrat and Eli. "But the sense of a new groundswell of violence in the West Bank is no surprise."

Sharon's opponents in Israel have accused the government of encouraging a new stage in Palestinian terror by withdrawing from Gaza unilaterally. Government officials say the move was meant as a stopgap measure in the absence of negotiations with the Palestinian Authority, but was never seen as a solution.

Taking no chances, Israel is continuing its own crackdowns in the West Bank. On Sunday, troops arrested five Hamas members, pursuing a dragnet that has already led to the detention of hundreds of suspected West Bank terrorists.

In a separate incident, undercover commandos killed an Islamic Jihad commander near Jenin. Military sources said the unit was on a routine patrol when the terrorist opened fire at it.

NHLer doesn't play on Yom Kippur

JTA

WASHINGTON — Jeff Halpern, the captain of the NHL's Washington Capitals, sat out a game because of Yom Kippur.

Halpern didn't play in the team's Oct. 12 game against the Carolina Hurricanes.

"I wish we didn't have a game. But it's too important to me, my family and the community that has supported me, not to participate in the holiday," Halpern told the Washington Post.

"I'm not the most religious person in the world, but this is something my family has always observed."

The Capitals lost the game 7-2.

Hamas leader arrested

Israel arrested a Hamas member wanted for his alleged involvement in deadly terror attacks. Ibrahim Ranimat, believed to have been involved in a 1997 bombing of the Apropos cafe in Tel Aviv, was arrested near Bethlehem. He is also believed to have been involved in the 1996 kidnapping and murder of Israeli soldier Sharon Edri. Also last week, Israeli soldiers arrested a 14-year-old Palestinian in a West Bank refugee camp who was believed to be planning a terror attack. The boy said the Fatah Party's Tanzim militia, including a member of the Palestinian Authority security forces, had pressured him into plotting the attack, the Jerusalem Post reported.

Saban buys Bezek

Israel's national phone company has been privatized. Israeli-American media baron Haim Saban and affiliated investors paid $944 million (US) for a 30 per cent stake in Bezek, with an option for another 10 per cent, effectively completing a takeover of the formerly state-owned firm. Bezek employees will enjoy profit-sharing and stock-option rights as part of the deal, but dozens are expected to be laid off. The takeover was announced in May, part of a privatization drive championed by then-finance minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Strategic dialogue resumes

Israel and the United States are resuming their strategic dialogue after a long hiatus. The first new round of bilateral talks will begin next month, based on an agreement between Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom and U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs, David Welch, officials in Jerusalem said. The dialogue, seen as a key means of maintaining the Israeli-U.S. alliance, was suspended three years ago amid Pentagon anger at Israel's arms technology exports to China, Ha'aretz reported.

German Jews praise Merkel

By TOBY AXELROD
JTA

BERLIN — As Germany stands on the brink of a new political era – about to have its first woman and first former East German as chancellor – Jews are peering over the horizon with cautious optimism.

Seven years of Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder turned out to be rather good for the Jews. But Angela Merkel isn't exactly an unknown quantity either.

When it comes to relations with Israel and with Germany's Jewish community, a Merkel administration isn't likely to bring much change, observers say. And transatlantic relations, another issue of import to the Jewish community, are likely to improve.

In coming weeks, Merkel's Christian Democrat Union (CDU) and Schroeder's party, the Social Democratic Union (SDU) will craft their coalition.

Paul Spiegel, head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, reserved comment until the new cabinet ministers are named, but others were less shy.

"There's no 'getting to know you,' no breaking-in period needed," Rabbi Israel Singer, chairman of the World Jewish Congress and president of the Claims Conference, said of Merkel. "We know her commitments."

Merkel "frequently finished a sentence that I began when we talked about Jewish issues. It's rare that you sit with somebody whom you don't need to win over and who is not only on the same page as you are, but on the same line as you are," Rabbi Singer said.

Merkel has "demonstrated considerable interest in a positive and dynamic relationship with the Jewish world," Deidre Berger, head of the American Jewish Committee office in Berlin, who also has met frequently with the CDU leader, said.

Merkel's track record on Jewish issues is "excellent," said Michael Wolffsohn, a history professor at the University of the Bundeswehr in Munich.

"She has always been in touch with the Central Council and the Israeli Embassy," Wolffsohn said. "Jewish-Israeli matters are close to her heart," as they are for the leadership of her party in general.

Merkel "is a direct, serious, knowledgeable, hands-on person who listens," said Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, "and she has very clear views on issues of our concern."

"I for one feel comfortable that her leadership will continue the dual tradition of taking responsibility for the past and being guided by it," Foxman said.

Merkel was born in 1954 to a Lutheran pastor and a teacher. She studied physics and worked as a chemist before becoming involved in politics after the fall of the Berlin Wall in November 1989.

She became a political protégé of former Chancellor Helmut Kohl, and has headed the CDU since 2000.

A proponent of economic and social reform, Merkel wants to make Germany more competitive by allowing longer work weeks and removing barriers to firing employees.

She is a strong advocate of transatlantic relations, and even supported the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq at a time when the view was most unpopular in Germany – a "high political risk" that Jewish leaders respected, Wolffsohn said.

In keeping with majority German opinion, however, Merkel rejects Turkish membership in the European Union.

For German Jews, the top items on the domestic agenda are integration of Jews from the former Soviet Union, funding for cash-strapped Jewish communities, support for Jewish education and training of rabbis, security, and efforts to combat anti-Semitism. Internationally, the issues are close ties with Israel and the United States.

Under Schroeder, Jewish communal life took a great leap forward with the signing of a historic contract in 2003 between the Central Council and the German government that placed the Jewish community on a legal par with the Protestant and Catholic churches.

Schroeder's foreign minister, Joschka Fischer, proved to be a great supporter of Israel, most observers agree.

The Schroeder administration also took a strong stand against anti-Semitism, particularly at the 2001 UN Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, where Fischer defended Israel, and at the conference on anti-Semitism in Europe convened by the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe and hosted in Berlin. Merkel was one of the speakers at the OSCE event.

"I look to Mrs. Merkel for at least as much understanding" as the past administration showed, Rabbi Singer said.

She "has always been sympathetic to us when she was in the opposition, and helped us on every issue in the last seven years," including the fight for home-care payments to Holocaust survivors.

Growing up in East Germany taught Merkel "the importance of what it is like to live under the yoke of a system that is not amenable to human rights," Rabbi Singer said.

Foxman said Merkel had made "her own pilgrimage" to come to terms with the Nazi past.

"She said to us that her parents tried to enlighten her contrary to what she was taught" in East Germany, which held that the Nazi perpetrators had all come from western Germany and which tended to deny the unique nature of the Jewish genocide.

Merkel "is aware of the poison that was fed to millions of Germans on the eastern side for years," Foxman said. The government "has the responsibility not only to be aware of it but to deal with it."

France, U.S. warn Iran on nuclear talks

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — France and the United States urged Iran last Friday to restart talks on its nuclear program and warned that the option of referring Tehran to the United Nations Security Council for possible punishment remains open.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said "we strongly encourage Iran" to seek a diplomatic solution with France, Britain and Germany, which led European negotiations with Iran until it effectively broke off the talks in August.

"The Iranians need to get involved in negotiations and restore the confidence of the international community that they are not trying to build a nuclear weapon," Rice said after meetings with French President Jacques Chirac and his foreign minister.

The French minister, Philippe Douste-Blazy, said France and the United States agree on the way forward for discussions with Iran. But he also underlined the need for firmness, saying the threat that Iran could be referred to the UN Security Council is real.

He said a civilian nuclear program in Iran should not need to be accompanied by fuel-making facilities, because Russia has offered to supply Iran with nuclear fuel. Washington fears that Iran wants to enrich uranium to make nuclear weapons, not to fuel civilian reactors as it claims.

"No civilian nuclear program can justify the fuel cycle," Douste-Blazy said.

Rice said the international community "has no reason to trust" that Iran "would deal responsibly with the fuel cycle."

Last month, the 35-nation board of the UN atomic watchdog agency approved a resolution that could lead to Iran's referral to the UN Security Council for violating a nuclear arms control treaty, unless Tehran eases suspicions about its nuclear activities.

Rice said the international community must make clear to Iran that while dialogue is possible so, too, is referral to the UN.

"It is a course that is available to the international community and it is therefore important that Iran negotiate in good faith," she said.

Douste-Blazy said the option of UN action must be "totally credible" and "must remain sufficiently dissuasive" to convince Iran to give up its sensitive nuclear activities.

Rabin's daughter furthers his legacy

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — Ten years after her father was felled by an assassin's bullet, Dalia Rabin is finally getting a little vindication.

She was happy to see that her country has matured in the past decade, and that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's own break with the settlement movement did not register the kind of rancour that culminated in Yitzhak Rabin's death on Nov. 4, 1995.

Her tone tinged with surprise, Rabin marvelled at the smoothness of Israel's recent withdrawal from the Gaza Strip.

"We were all surprised how smooth it went, relative to what was expected. It took Israeli society time, 10 years, to become ripe for such a move," Rabin told JTA recently in Washington, where she launched commemorations of her father's legacy that will culminate Nov. 12 at the educational centre named for him in Tel Aviv.

"We proved that, after all, with the right leadership and with the consistency and the strong determination of Ariel Sharon," extremists "did not have the political support they did in 1995," she said.

The change is not simply a matter of edging toward political civility, Rabin said, but of coming around to her father's vision of Israel as a "normalizer" of Jews and a confident actor on the world stage.

"He thought that we already came to the point that we made peace with our neighbours, and now we have to define for ourselves who we want to be," she said.

A decade later, she said, Sharon – once one of Rabin's fiercest political rivals – has come around to the same vision.

"Ariel Sharon finally decided when he took this position, the disengagement, that this is the only way, and he realized that this is the way to gain the support of the world," Rabin said. "After doing the disengagement, Ariel Sharon came to the UN for the first time. He came from the feeling that the world is not against us anymore."

Still, Rabin sees much work ahead, and she aims to help effect change through her chairmanship of the Yitzhak Rabin Center for Israel Studies' educational wing.

"The most successful program right now is workshops within the army, border police and police. We have about 12,000 soldiers and policemen coming for one-day workshops in the centre every year for the last three years," she said. "You should hear what they say in the morning when they come, when they start each workshop.

"We've got a lot of work to do."

Her father's name still draws major-league attention. Former U.S. president Bill Clinton, whose eloquent eulogy to Rabin still resonates in Israel, helped raise $1.5 million (US) for the Rabin Center at a Sept. 22 dinner in Washington, and he will keynote the Nov. 12 event in Israel.

"In the last 10 years, hardly a day has gone by that I have not missed Yitzhak Rabin in a personal, aching way," Clinton said at the dinner. "The only thing we can do is to be more like him."

The Communications Workers of America also pitched in on a farewell request from its retiring president, Morton Bahr, who was close to the Rabins. A Rabin Center wing will be named for Bahr, who paid for the September dinner.

In 2003, the U.S. Congress appropriated $5 million for the centre.

Rabin said such support from U.S. institutions was appropriate, given her father's closeness to the United States – he served as ambassador to Washington in the late 1960s and early 1970s – and given the Bush administration's current mission to spread democracy in the Middle East.

"I based my approach to the people on [Capitol Hill] on my father being a very, very important pillar in creating the relationship between Israel and the United States," she said.

"The United States still represents the superpower that pushes forward democracy all over the world," and Israel should be engaged in that effort, she said.

Rabin, 55, seems to have found her niche in chairing the centre. She seems relaxed, and in personal interviews she displays the same engaged, tempered curiosity that characterized her father in conversation. They also share a close physical resemblance, especially in her reserved half-smile.

Rabin spent much of the last decade in her own turbulent quest to find her place in her father's legacy. In 1999 she helped found the Center Party, imagined as Israel's salvation from the old Likud and Labor stalemate.

The party imploded in recriminations within a few years, and its six former Knesset representatives now barely speak to one another.

For a brief period Rabin was Israel's deputy defence minister – the first woman to hold the position – but she quit after a year.

Eighteen months ago, she made headlines when she was hospitalized for heart palpitations after learning that her father's assassin, Yigal Amir, hoped to marry. The prison services won't allow it, though Amir's request is snaking its way through the legal system.

Just pronouncing the name of the man serving a life sentence for killing her father still sends visible shivers down Rabin's spine. Speaking of Amir, she unleashes some of the fury her late mother, Leah, was famous for.

"This was a Jew, wearing a yarmulke, with Jewish ideology, deciding to put an end to a political process by killing a prime minister," she said, leaning forward in the hotel divan. "And unfortunately, for a long time it seemed that he succeeded."

She paused.

"And he has a lot of supporters in Israeli society," she added.

Judy and David present their alternative to Christmas

BY PAM CLAVIR
Special to The CJN

One of the most prolific children's acts in North America, Thornhill's very own Judy and David, are bringing their bouncy and interactive children's musical performance Chanukah Live to the GTA for the fifth straight year.

If you don't have young children at home, you may not know that this Juno award-winning pair are the stars of Treehouse TV's hit series Judy & David's Boom Box, which features a new original song written by the duo on every show.

With 18 recordings, a hit TV show, a 1998 Juno award for best children's album and a nomination for a 2005 Juno for children's album of the year, Judy and David are Canada's top-grossing children's entertainers with millions of recordings sold worldwide.

So why have a Chanukah show?

"Chanukah Live was created as an alternative to all the Christmas parties. We wanted to do something similar for Jewish families and thought we should have representation for Chanukah," said David (Gershon), who has two children of his own with Judy. "Chanukah parties tend to be a guy with an accordion, and not a big production like Ross Petty shows that tend to be big and theatrical."

And this production is big, with talented members from York Region's CharActor Theatre Troupe taking part in a show that features candlelighting, Boomy the Boom Box, the Magic Menorah, Bagel the Dog and other surprises.

Yet people of all faiths attend the Chanukah Live show because the performance is engaging, David said.

From rock to Klezmer, jazz to country, and calypso to hip-hop, Judy and David exude a sense of joy and playfulness with their music and movement.

"Music has a way of breaking down barriers, and not only by appreciating someone's culture or musical tastes, although that is one way of building connections between people," said Judy (Adelman Gershon). "But it's also by bringing everyone together, having everybody jump up and down and becoming a group. Not too many other experiences can give you that instant connection with people around you."

Married in 1991, Judy and David met when she was teaching Sunday school to kindergartners and he was the substitute music teacher. Judy was impressed with the way David led her class in a sing-song and instantly fell for him.

Bumping into each other three months later at a Chanukah party, they got to talking. Talking turned to singing and the rest is musical history.

Judy has degrees in teaching and piano performance from the University of Toronto. A former orchestra and bandleader, she can play numerous instruments.

"That's why we don't let her play any instruments on stage," laughed David, although Judy sometimes plays piano at a performance.

"Judy is already the looks, the brains, the talent and the voice. That doesn't leave me much to do, which is why I play guitar on stage."

The Medium is the Matzo for artist Melissa Shiff

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Video, performance and installation artist Melissa Shiff is rethinking and reframing Jewish ritual through her creative installations and video art.

"I believe that Judaism is not only a religion but also a place from which to create commentary on the world today," says the 38-year-old conceptual artist. "I am not bound to one medium."

She explains that conceptual art "uses whatever you need to express a concept."

Shiff's art reflects her reinvigorating of the long continuum of Jewish tradition and ritual over the millennia juxtaposed with recent experiences in the Jewish Diaspora.

"It is not so much the object but the idea. I am fascinated with Jewish rituals because they are performances of identity. They contain so much history and have the potential of becoming vehicles of artistic expression."

Shiff was raised in a secular home. She attended Forest Hill Collegiate in Toronto, received her training at The School of the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston and holds a degree from Tufts University.

She will participate in an art exhibit as part of ReJewvenation 2005: The Futures of Jewish Culture, to be held Oct. 28 to 31. The conference is presented by University of Toronto is organized by professors Andrea Most, Anna Shternshis and Louis Kaplan. The art exhibition will be on display from Oct. 21 to Nov. 20, with an opening reception Oct. 23.

The show will include Shiff's video installation Gender Cuts: The Jew Under the Knife, a feminist inquiry into the ritual of circumcision.

To commemorate its 100th anniversary, the Jewish Museum in Prague (JMP) has chosen Shiff to be its keynote artist for the Year of Jewish Culture. Her show will open in April 2006 in the Czech Republic.

A new, site-specific creation by Shiff titled Ark, conceived and created for the JMP centennial, will be on display for seven months.

JMP director Leo Lavlat says Shiff's work is powerful. "It has a great potential for becoming a highly effective tool for bridging differences, for increasing the mutual understanding of people from various cultural and ethnic backgrounds as well as various religious and political affiliations."

Ark is an outdoor creation. It will be installed on Pinkas Street, adjacent to the Pinkas Synagogue and the Holocaust Memorial at the Old Jewish Cemetery, both of which are visited by some 600,000 visitors each year.

Shiff's Ark project consists of a 15-foot-high ship/ark made of translucent material that Lavlat says "will resonate with the Prague flood of 2002 as well as the ancient biblical flood for which Noah built his ark. The contemporary ark will also serve as a symbol of Jewish Diaspora, displacement, escape and salvage, issues that have been especially pertinent to the Jewish experience in the past century."

The ship will also be a symbol of travel and refuge, he says, "but by being stationary, it will also be a metaphor for the impossibility of escaping catastrophic times."

Shiff has prepared a video projection from the JMP's collection to illuminate the ark and its two sails. She says this projection onto the boat reflects the rich cultural contents of the Jewish people's collective memory and tradition.

Two new versions of Shiff's earlier works, The Medium is the Matzo, and Avant-Garde Jewish Wedding will also be on exhibition in Prague.

Avant-Garde Jewish Wedding is a short film of her own wedding staged as a multimedia performance art piece on Oct. 12, 2003. It has been screened at major Jewish film festivals in Canada and Argentina.

Shiff explains that in her presentation of The Medium is the Matzo, "the matzah becomes a medium in the story we tell at Passover, a symbol of oppression.

"So, as an artist, I wanted to create an environment that the viewer would relate to – contemporary forms of oppression such as hunger and homelessness."

Each of the 600 pillows in the exhibit has a photographic image of a matzah with the words, "Crush Oppression."

"When viewers walk on the pillows, they are crushing oppression."

Melissa Shiff: The Medium is the Matzo.

Shiff also rephrases traditional Jewish rituals within the context of contemporary, postmodern society in her other works: Looking for Ararat, Times Square Seder: Featuring the Matzoh Ball Soup Kitchen, Passover Projections – Slaves to Memory and Elijah Chair, which is in the permanent collection in the Jewish Museum in New York.

The Passover Projections installation is an interactive projection that superimposes the viewer onto the scene of Cecil B. DeMille's film The Ten Commandments, where the Jews flee from slavery through the miraculous parting of the Red Sea.

"This installation," she says, "enacts the Passover injunction to consider yourself as if you were a slave in Egypt who is being liberated."

Shiff is a member of the York University advanced research seminar for the study of Jewish Diaspora and New Media. She is a member of the advisory board of Mosaica, a website for Jewish art online.

SHURUM BURUM CD RELEASE: Critically acclaimed Toronto-based trumpeter and composer David Buchbinder launches his first solo jazz CD – SHURUM BURUM Jazz Circus – a stylistically surprising CD that travels a large musical/emotional palette and features a top-notch ensemble of musicians.

Buchbinder has enjoyed a rich and multi-facted career that spans world music with his Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, Medina, and a fledgling Roma Brass Band; composition of six feature film scores, numerous short films (including the animated Stone of Folly which won the Cannes Film Festival Prix du Jury); music for radio, dance and theatre (including Shadowland's The Lost Supper earlier this month and large scale creation (the Ashkenaz Festival and SHURUM BURUM Jazz Circus). He now returns to his jazz roots with the release of his first recording under his own name which Buchbinder co-produced with Juno winner Roberto Occhipinti.

Toronto parkette to be named for poet George Faludy

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Sixteen years after the well-known Hungarian-Jewish poet George Faludy moved back to his native Budapest, the city of Toronto is planning to designate a downtown parkette in his honour across from the apartment building at 25 St. Mary St., near Charles and Bay, where he lived for many years.

Plans call for a monument – a bronze medallion featuring Faludy's likeness by Toronto sculptor Dora de Pedery-Hunt – to be unveiled in the George Faludy Parkette at a ceremony in the spring of 2006, coinciding with the 50th anniversary of the Hungarian uprising of 1956.

Mayor David Miller wrote the 95-year-old poet this summer, explaining that the city's Legacy Committee wished "to recognize your outstanding accomplishments in the art of poetry and literature, as well as your significant contribution to the intellectual life of the City of Toronto." The committee has previously honoured only one other artist in a similar way, having named a courtyard in the Toronto Dominion Centre last year after jazz pianist Oscar Peterson.

Born in 1910, Faludy lived in Toronto for 23 years, from 1966 to '89, and returned to Hungary after the fall of the Berlin Wall. A Canadian citizen, he taught at the University of Toronto and received an honorary doctorate from the university in 1978. While in Toronto, he was the centre of a vibrant circle of Hungarian intellectuals, including the writer George Jonas.

His translations of the poems by 15th-century French poet François Villon made him a literary celebrity in Hungary in the late '30s; an ardent anti-fascist, he managed to evade the Nazis and escape to Paris. Although a warrant had been issued for his arrest, a kindly Hungarian official promised to keep it in a drawer until receiving a postcard from him of the Paris Opera House.

After the war, in 1949, the Hungarian communists were enraged at Faludy's refusal to pen a birthday tribute to Matyas Rakosi, the country's Stalinist boss, and sent him to the Recsk concentration camp. He survived the notoriously brutal conditions in the camp, which closed after the death of Stalin in 1953. In his autobiography My Happy Days in Hell, written in London in 1966, he explained that he survived by maintaining a rigorously intellectual inner life, writing poems in his head and giving lectures on philosophy, literature and art to his fellow inmates.

"[Writer-critic] Arthur Koestler referred to him as the greatest living Hungarian poet," said Grace Westcott, an arts lawyer and volunteer with the city's Legacy Committee, which has raised about $8,000 of the $20,000 cost needed for parkette landscaping, the medallion and a plaque. The Legacy Project was initiated by Toronto's former poet laureate, Dennis Lee, who has translated some of Faludy's poems.

Faludy had an international reputation in Toronto and "was part of our lives," Lee recalled. "He was very courtly and for such a wiry little man, larger than life. He wrote some of his best poetry here."

Tribute evenings were held on both sides of the Atlantic in September to mark his 95th birthday. One took place at the Toronto Reference Library, the other at the Hungarian National Theatre in Budapest, where Mayor Miller's letter announcing the parkette was read in his presence. The Canadian Embassy in Budapest is also planning a party in his honour in December.

"We're creating a small beauty spot in the city," Westcott said. "It's really important that we honour our writers."

For further information, contact Terry Nicholson of the city's cultural affairs department, 416-392-8674.

BENNY GOODMAN TRIBUTE

The Ross Wooldridge Sextet will be performing a tribute to Benny Goodman on Oct. 24, 8 p.m. at the Old Mill Inn, Toronto.

Wooldridge, one of Canada's leading arrangers and a master clarinetist, has chosen a marvelous cast of players to fill the roles of Goodman's band: Lionel Hampton (vibraphonist Frank Wright) Charlie Christian (guitarist Jesse Barksdale) Teddy Wilson (pianist Danny McErlain) Gene Krupa (drummer Glen Anderson) and Neil Swainson on bass.

The host for the evening will be JAZZ.FM91 program host Larry Green.

Tickets $22 for JAZZ.FM91 members and students. $25 all others. 416-595-0404 extension 245

Israel's peace treaty with Jordan is the subject of a timely film

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's historic peace treaty with Jordan, signed amid fanfare and optimism 11 years ago this week, was the culmination of years of secret contacts.

The two nations finally ended their state of war on Oct. 26, 1994 with an agreement that could only be described as a diplomatic triumph for Israel.

But long before that day, Israel and Jordan had been resolving common problems through clandestine talks. This is the premise of Dov Gil-Har's absorbing documentary, Shalom, Jordan, which was screened at the last Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

The one-hour movie, which is in Hebrew with English sub-titles, suggests that Israel and Jordan came achingly close to signing a peace treaty in the early 1950s and again in 1987.

King Hussein

In the wake of the first Arab-Israeli war, King Abdullah I of Jordan was seriously ready to come to terms with Israel. But with Abdullah's assassination, talk of an agreement vanished.

Israel's then foreign minister, Shimon Peres, drafted a treaty with King Hussein, Abdullah's grandson, in 1987. But Israel's recalcitrant prime minister, Yitzhak Shamir, was simply not interested.

After Abdullah's untimely death, Israel and Jordan had no unofficial contacts until 1963, when Israel received a message from King Hussein's Jewish dentist in London. He informed Israel's ambassador in Britain, Yaacov Herzog, that he was ready for a dialogue.

Gil-Har glosses over King Hussein's unwise decision to attack Israel in the opening hours of the 1967 Six Day War. But he reminds us that Jordan's ignominious defeat, with the loss of the West Bank, did not cool King Hussein's ardour to continue meeting Israeli officials.

In the years to come, he met with Israelis from Yigal Allon to Abba Eban, all of whom received ornamental swords as gifts.

Gil-Har also skims over another important episode – King Hussein's warning to Israel, in September 1973, that Egypt and Syria planned to regain the Sinai Peninsula and the Golan Heights by means of war.

But he compensates for this omission by focusing on the 1993 Oslo accords, which King Hussein regarded as a slap in the face. Israel apparently did not apprise Jordan of its talks with the Palestinians, and when the news of the breakthrough was announced, King Hussein was caught completely off-guard.

Israel's prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin, was a great advocate of peace with Jordan. But after the Oslo era was launched, Gil-Har claims, to the beat of the score for the TV show Mission Impossible, he was skeptical about such prospects.

Peres, Israel's foreign minister, thought otherwise and conducted negotiations with King Hussein. Through a slip of the tongue, Peres let it be known that peace with Jordan was at hand. The disclosure so infuriated King Hussein that Rabin shunted Peres aside and took over the Jordan file.

Rabin, in turn, entrusted the talks to Efraim Halevi, the British-born director of the Mossad. According to Gil-Har, Halevi and King Hussein actually drew up the peace agreement.

This was followed by a series of mutual friendly gestures, from Rabin's visit to Petra – a mythical place for Israelis – to King Hussein's flamboyant flyover of Israel with an Israeli escort.

Signed in a festive ceremony in the Arava desert, the peace treaty has been mutually beneficial. But problems have arisen and, as Israel's former ambassador to Amman charges, Israel has failed to assign top priority to its pivotal relationship with Jordan.

"This is a peace that has soured," he says, referring to Israel's botched assassination of a top Hamas official in Amman in 1997 and the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in 2000.

Despite bumps in the road, Israel and Jordan are at peace, all the more so since Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip, and that is what a viewer should bear in mind when watching Shalom, Jordan.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

As we turn the page into the New Year of 5766, Eye On Arts presents its annual survey of what some people in the arts and literary community are reading.

PEOPLE OF THE BOOK

Toronto-born poet Yerra Sugarman, who is a university lecturer on creative writing in New York, recently read Hope Against Hope, the first part of Nadezhda Mandelstam's memoir about her husband, the Russian poet Osip Mandelstam, who died about 1938 in the Stalinist purges in the Soviet Union. Sugarman read the Max Hayward translation published by Modern Library in 1999.

"I had always wanted to read this book because Mandelstam is arguably one of the major poets of the 20th century," Sugarman said. "He wrote a very light-hearted satire about Stalin and he was arrested and exiled, and he finally died in a camp. His wife and others memorized his poetry to keep it alive. Because of her efforts, the work lived."

Hope Against Hope is "a very well-written memoir. On another level, it talks about the effects of the Stalinist purges on the intelligentsia in Russia. It's also an amazing account of what it is to be a writer and a poet. I really think it's something people should read if they want to be a writer."

Sugarman also had deep praise for Clouded Sky, a book of poetry by Hungarian-Jewish poet Miklos Radnoti, who was killed by wartime fascists. "He was buried in a mass grave, the body was exhumed, and his wife found a notebook of his poems in his pocket."

Radnoti's translated poems were published by Sheep Meadow Press, the same house that brought out Sugarman's award-winning collection, Forms of Gone.

Winnipeg author Allan Levine offers reserved praise for George Jonas's very recent Beethoven's Mask: Notes on My Life and Times (Key Porter). "He's a very erudite journalist and a deep thinker. The man is very interesting, quite insightful and very passionate. I've always liked his columns [in the National Post]."

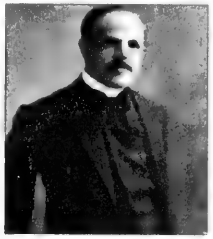
Stretching from Jonas's birth in Hungary in 1935 to 9/11, Beethoven's Mask is "part memoir and part essay" and offers intelligent commentary on the Holocaust, terrorism and politics as well as many personal episodes. "He spends an awful lot of time talking about the Holocaust, and his point is that it's not a singularly unique event in world history," Levine said.

"He's wrong – he doesn't understand the systematic aspect of the Holocaust. If it wasn't unique, it was unprecedented and it's not just a footnote of history. He just failed to understand the systematic nature of how the Holocaust was implemented. He doesn't understand that the gas chambers of Auschwitz make the whole thing different than anything else."



Allan Levine, left, Haim Nachman Bialik and Russian poet Osip Mandelstam

Jonas also writes about Israel, Levine reports, and makes some interesting points about nationalism and anti-Semitism. "It's a thought-provoking book. He set out to write about his life and times, and I think he succeeded. I would recommend it even though I don't agree with it. It's sure to infuriate some people."

Allan Levine's most recent book is The Devil in Babylon (McClelland and Stewart).

Toronto editor-playwright Lily Poritz Miller saw Lajos Koltai's film Fateless during the Toronto International Film Festival and was greatly moved by it. "I was so deeply stirred by this account of a 14-year-old Hungarian Jewish boy's experiences in German concentration camps that I tracked down the book," she said.

The novel was written by Imre Kertesz in Hungarian and originally published in 1975. Poritz Miller read the English translation by Christopher and Katharina Wilson, published by Northwestern University Press.

"It's a heart-wrenching story told with an innocence that makes it all the more poignant. Step by step, one is taken into the atrocities and indignities which the boy so stoically faces. The details are so vividly and so effortlessly brought to life… I can understand why Kertesz received the Nobel Prize for Literature" in 2002.

Poritz Miller, former senior editor for McClelland and Stewart, recently co-translated and co-edited A Thousand Threads: A Story Told through Yiddish Letters (Remembrance Books).

Ralph Wintrob, a former North York teacher-librarian who gives book club presentations, recently read Foiglman, by Israeli author Aharon Megged. Originally published in 1968, the book was translated into English and published by Israel's Toby Press in 2003.

"It's a story of a Holocaust survivor who is a poet, and an Israeli professor of the Holocaust who is anything but a poet – he's pedantic and rational. The relationship between these two develops quite accidentally, becomes quite passionate on both sides, and then ends tragically.

"It's really quite a powerful work about the relation between Israel and the Diaspora, between the generation of the Holocaust and the generation after the Holocaust, and about the inability of language to convey profound experiences."

Wintrob was also impressed recently by another translated volume from the Toby Press: Random Harvest and Other Novellas by the famed poet Haim Nachman Bialik. "It absolutely blew me away. Here is prose written like poetry, and it's so evocative and rich that you can't read too much at once. The imagery and symbolism are just overwhelming. This is a side of Bialik that nobody knows."

Wearing tight, pointed shoes may cause Morton's neuroma

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

We tend to take our feet for granted – they are expected to take us from here to there without any argument. We wash them, dry them, put socks or stockings and shoes on them, and away we go.

We use them to work, to transport us and to participate in our favourite leisure activities. They are supposed to get us around for a lifetime. We may abuse them – some of us loathe them – but they usually serve us well anyway, that is, until something goes wrong.

Those who have had foot problems, including bunions, heel pain and ingrown toenails, can testify to the pain and discomfort they've suffered.

Another problem that can cause foot pain is Morton's neuroma, a condition in which the nerves that run between the long bones (metatarsals) of the foot become irritated and then pinched or enlarged.

Toronto podiatrist Hartley Miltchin said neuroma might be caused from and aggravated by wearing tight, poorly fitting, pointed shoes.

The patient experiences "burning, numbness, pins and needles, sort of like an electric shock," Miltchin said.

The problem usually occurs in the middle two toes, closest to the small toe. "When the infrequent pain strikes, the patient has to take off the shoe and massage the foot to relieve the pain."

Miltchin compared neuroma to carpal tunnel syndrome, which occurs in the wrist.

A conservative treatment for neuroma, he said, is by high-speed, high-intensity laser, which has proved successful. Other treatments include prescription orthotics, which balance the front of the foot and therefore take the pressure off the nerve, ultrasound therapy and cortisone or vitamin B injections.

If conservative therapy proves ineffective, Miltchin said, surgery may be necessary. The newest type of surgery, which he and two colleagues have introduced, involves releasing the ligament between the adjacent metatarsals in order to relieve pressure on the affected nerve.

This procedure is performed in the office, under local anesthetic, and takes only about 10 minutes. A bandage is applied afterward and the patient walks out, resuming normal activities soon after.

Miltchin warned that the longer the condition has been present, the thicker the nerve becomes, and so there is less chance of success.

Currently, Miltchin is developing a non-invasive method to treat neuroma, using the Swiss DolorClast equipment. This is an electronic instrument he introduced to Canada to treat heel pain and Achilles tendonitis. He believes it can be used successfully on neuroma as well.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I have three kids, ages 11, 8 and 5. They all eat very differently, but I don't think that any of them has a balanced diet, and I am concerned. One hates dairy, one hates meat and one hates vegetables. How do I get them eating these foods?

A. You probably can't and probably don't need to. I know that I would not want to be forced to eat something I don't like, so I wouldn't try to force someone else to. Most kids do not eat perfectly balanced diets, but neither do most adults. As long as your child is getting either fruits or vegetables on a daily basis, some whole grains (whole grain breads, cereals, pasta, crackers, etc.) and some protein (meat, poultry, fish, eggs, nuts, soy or dairy) then you're likely okay.

If you think your child who doesn't like dairy is not getting any calcium at all, you can try calcium enriched orange juice, (but it is high in calories, as is all juice) or almonds or calcium enriched soy products. If all of that fails, talk to your child's doctor about a calcium supplement. However, kids who dislike milk often like chocolate milk, cheese, yogurt, frozen yogurt, ice cream or milkshakes. Make sure you've exhausted all of these options but without pressure. The less of an issue you make around food the better.

Q. I am finding that most baked goods in the store and bakery contain a lot of white flour, white sugar and trans fat. Is there an alternative?

A. Unfortunately you are right. There are, however, some brands and bakeries committed to using healthier ingredients. A good place to start looking is in specialty (health) grocery stores or health food stores. Or try the health food section of your big grocery store. Many of the natural and organic brands are committed to using more natural, healthier ingredients.

Another excellent solution is to make it yourself. It is more time consuming but always worth the effort in taste and nutrition. Try making oatmeal chocolate chip cookies, raisin bran muffins, banana nut bread, carrot muffins, whole wheat chocolate chip cookies with added wheat germ, low fat coffee cake or blueberry bran muffins. When baking, simply follow your favourite recipe and replace the white flour with whole wheat in muffins and most cakes. Then, for butter, oil, margarine or shortening, substitute with either plain yogurt, buttermilk or applesauce (this doesn't work in cookies) and reduce the sugar slightly or substitute with Splenda. Make a double batch and freeze the extra, or refrigerate half the batter for fresh baked goods again in a few days. Another easy way to get into lighter baking is to pick up a healthy eating magazine. They are full of seasonal recipes and gorgeous pictures and very affordable compared to the cost of a new cookbook.

Money raised at the bazaar will be directed to three hospitals: the trauma units at Hadassah Medical Centre in Israel and at Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre in Toronto, and the Comprehensive Breast Care Institute at the Assaf Harofeh Hospital in Israel.

'End to conflict far off'

former Prime Ministers Yitzhak Rabin, Shimon Peres and Menachem Begin have won the Nobel Peace Prize.

"His work is important and a major contribution to the world of economics and to theory," Hebrew University President Menachem Megidor told Israel Radio.

Schelling, 84, is a University of Maryland lecturer recognized for his application of game theory to issues of global security.

Aumann's work has focused on the more abstract principle of "repeated games," or conflict that lasts over an extended period.

In a telephone conversation with the academy, he suggested that this could give insight into Israel's struggle for survival in the Middle East.

"I do hope that perhaps some game theory can be used and be part of this solution," he said.

But Aumann, who lost a son during Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982, said an end to the conflict with the Palestinians is far off.

"It's been going on for at least 80 years, and as far as I can see, it is going to go on for at least another 80 years. I don't see any end to this one, I'm sorry to say," he told reporters.

British playwright Pinter wins Nobel for literature

JTA

British Jewish playwright Harold Pinter won the Nobel Prize for Literature last week

Pinter, 75, has attributed some of the alienation and isolation that permeates his work to the anti-Semitism he experienced as a child in London's East End. His works include Betrayal, The Homecoming and The Birthday Party, and his spare style – echoed in the works of David Mamet and a host of other playwrights – has spawned the adjective "Pinteresque."

Announcing Pinter's prize Oct. 13, the Swedish Academy said his writing "forces entry into oppression's closed rooms."

In recent years, Pinter has been an outspoken opponent of the Iraq war and a supporter of Mordechai Vanunu, the Israeli jailed for 18 years for revealing his country's nuclear secrets.

TO fans celebrate Maccabi Tel Aviv win against Raptors

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israeli consul Yakov (Kobi) Brosh was grinning from ear to ear. NBA commissioner David Stern, not so much.

As thousands of pro-Tel Aviv spectators waved Israeli flags, danced and whooped with joy, Brosh high-fived other courtside spectators. The reason for his joy and Stern's chagrin? Maccabi Elite Tel Aviv had just handed the Toronto Raptors a 105-103 defeat, on their home court no less, and for supporters of the team, the last-second win over the Raptors felt like an international championship.

Surrounded by Israeli media – the game was covered extensively in Israel and broadcast there on tape delay – Israeli coach Pini Gershon acknowledged it was a "great feeling, a great win for the club away, in North America.

"Raptors played their best players and it wasn't easy. Maccabi committed several mistakes but the team played much better in the second half."

The game was played in a festive atmosphere with much more emotion than a normal pre-season game would warrant. Maccabi, winner of the last two Euroleague championships, scored first, Toronto quickly tied and then took a lead they nursed until the final minutes. At halftime, they led by 12 and they expanded the lead to 14 points at one point in the third quarter.

But the yellow-clad Israeli squad, led by American forward Anthony Parker and Croatian centre Nikola Vujcic, kept chipping away at the lead, hitting shots from the perimeter, and turning away Raptor forays.

With 2:39 left in the contest, Maccabi Elite took a 95-93 lead, their first since the opening minute. They never relinquished the lead, though the Raptors twice tied the score, the last time with only 18.8 seconds on the clock at 103 each.

In its last-ditch attempt at victory, Israel fielded four guards plus Parker. Parker, last year's Euroleague MVP, later described his game-winning basket like this: "We drew it up for me to get the ball... It didn't happen exactly the way we drew it up, but I did end up getting the ball. Once I had it, I just wanted to make sure I got the last shot. It's something I've practised a lot and thank God it went in."

Parker's fade-away jumper from the baseline with .8 seconds left on the clock drew a thunderous cheer from the partisan crowd and sealed the Raptors' fate.

"I thought before the game that the place would be full of Raptor fans, but they cheered for us during critical moments in the game and it helped push us to win the game," Gershon said.

Nutrition in Motion
We do the diet ...
You lose the weight!
"The biggest bonus of the service is its convenience. I'm a guy, I don't know how to shop for healthy foods or pick out good vegetables or know how much meat we should eat at dinner. It's really like a blessing for me."

Israel hockey juniors to play in Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto

By PAUL LUNGEN & DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporters

When Israel's under-18 hockey team faces off against players from LaurenHill Academy in Montreal, and later against Forest Hill Selects in Toronto, it will mark less than a year since the junior squad was last in Canada for an exhibition game, but eons in terms of team development, evolution, and the progress of Israeli hockey as a whole.

That's a point Alan Maislin, chair for the last two years of the Israeli Ice Hockey Federation, wanted to make clear in the run-up to the event.

Since the under-18s laced skates against Montreal's Bialik High School in 2003 – and lost – the calibre of Israeli hockey has grown by leaps and bounds, he said.

Last winter, the junior "Team Israel" won the bronze medal in Bulgaria at the International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) Championships. The senior players were no slouches either, garnering a completely unexpected gold medal two weeks later at the IIHF Division II, Group B championship, in Belgrade. That win moved Israel up to the IIHF's Division I.

Add to that the fact the Israeli hockey federation now has a developing scouting program, training camps and ambitious plans to develop coaching as well as native player talent both at home and abroad (two Israeli kids are now training at the Athol Murray College of Notre Dame in Wilcox, Sask.) and you have a level of respectability Israeli hockey never enjoyed before.

Next March in Metulla, headquarters for Israeli hockey at the Canada Centre, Israel will for the first time host the IIHF world championships.

"We're no different than Team Canada, except we don't have money," joked Maislin, who has been largely credited for being responsible for the progress made.

Maislin defers that credit. He gives it to people like former Montreal Canadiens coach Jean Perron, who coaches the Israeli teams, the late Roger Neilson, who ran a hockey camp every summer in Metulla, and to others who have played a big part in the development of Israeli hockey.

The games in Toronto and Montreal will be part of a two-week, six-city North American exhibition tour for the under-18s that will include stops in Florida, Philadelphia, New York, Ottawa (Oct. 27) and Toronto.

"We're bringing Israel to the rest of the world," Maislin said.

The team will arrive in Toronto on Oct. 28 and play a friendly game against the Forest Hill Selects at the Pavilion Ice Arena on the 29th, said Steven Maislin, chair of the Toronto visit. The team will practise on the 30th before flying home later the same day, he added.

Steven Maislin said the boys will be billeted with families and one of the goals of the visit is to cement bonds established last February when the team trained in Toronto prior to the IIHF tournament. Fundraising will not be a component of the upcoming visit to Toronto, though last February $60,000 was raised to rent ice at the team's home rink in Metulla and for two scholarships for the Israeli boys attending school in Saskatchewan.

Alan Maislin said Eli Sherbatov, a sabra skater now playing in Quebec, is one of the players the under-18 team is relying upon. Dubbed "the Chosen One," in the tradition of the Great One, the Magnificent One and the Next One, Sherbatov was Israel's top scorer in Bulgaria, racking up nine points in five games, even though he was playing against guys four years older. Alan Maislin said he's now tearing up his bantam league in Quebec.

Sherbatov, 14, was born in Rehovot, the son of Russian olim. His mother, Anna, was a skating coach in Moscow before immigrating to Israel. She's now working in Montreal as a power-skating coach.

While in Montreal, the Israeli juniors will participate in two fundraising hockey clinics involving Perron, former Canadien Gaston Gingras, TSN analyst Pierre McGuire and Philadelphia Flyers head coach Ken Hitchcock, whose team will be in town for a game against the Habs.

Israeli hockey, Alan Maislin said, is a far cry from what it was when he took over the helm of the Israeli hockey federation only two years ago.

"We were just four guys sitting around a table," he recalled. "Now we have a five-year plan, a business plan, with hundreds of volunteers, and I think we can sustain it."

A new generation of sabra talent is being honed. "Now we have kids with the potential to go pro," Alan Maislin said.

There's also a sea change in how the team perceives itself.

"Playing well and losing is not good enough for us anymore," Maislin said. "We're a different team and a different organization."

For more specific information on the juniors schedule in Canada, visit the Israel Ice Hockey Federation site at www.israel-hockey.com.

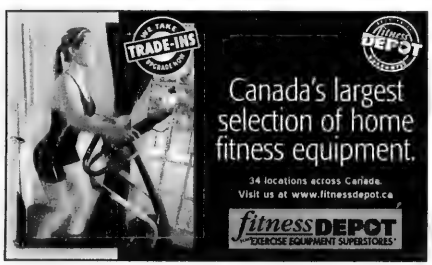
World Cup hopes over

CJN News Services

JERUSALEM — Israel was mathematically eliminated from World Cup contention last week when France defeated Cyprus 4-0. Had Cyprus won – which would have been a shocking upset – Israel would have come in second in its group and advanced to a playoff for a space in next summer's tournament in Germany.

Israel last appeared in the World Cup in 1970.

France finished on top of Europe qualifying Group 4 with 20 points. Switzerland finished even with Israel at 18 points, but will advance to a playoff round thanks to a superior goal differential.



Maccabi Tel Aviv stuns Raptors

Later, team officials and players – and many spectators – could be seen with cellphones pressed to their ears, telling the world what had just transpired. Gershon at one point held two phones, one pressed to each ear.

Brosh said, "I think the best director could not create a better story than we had today."

"It's a great day," said Yaniv Green, whose lay-up in the last minute gave Israel a 103-101 lead. "It's a historic day for Maccabi Tel Aviv.

"Everybody remembers the game Maccabi played and won against the Washington Bullets 20-something years ago. They are still talking about it and I'm sure 20 years from now they will still be talking about this one."

In the other dressing room, Raptors coach Sam Mitchell said, "We knew these guys were going to play hard… They came out to try to prove something. You have to tip your hat to them – they played well. We got them down by 14 points and they kept fighting back.

"There are good players around the world. Just because you're in the NBA doesn't mean there's people out there that aren't battling or just as good. If you don't play, for the most part, at certain positions, the talent level is the same. It comes down to execution and who wants it. They beat us, there's no ifs, ands or buts about it."

While the Raptors are not a particularly good NBA team, Maccabi Elite Tel Aviv is no ordinary Israeli squad. Winners of Israel's national cup 35 times, league champions 45 times, they have also won five Euroleague titles, including the last two.

General manager Ami Eshel said Maccabi does not approach even friendly games against opponents as mere exhibitions. "It's a challenge and Maccabi does not like to lose any game. It's part of the spirit of Maccabi… The organization stresses winning," he said.

Maccabi co-owner David Federman said the team has a special place in the psyche of the Israeli people. When it plays in a European championship, "the country practically comes to a stop."

In addition to its win on the court, Israel scored another victory on Sunday, Brosh suggested. "Maccabi Tel Aviv in Israel is a symbol. It was here to show to the Canadian people that Israel has more to offer than politics and terror. We have many achievements. Today, [Canadians] know that Israel is much more than political problems."

Raptors minority owner Larry Tanenbaum had for some time discussed taking the team to Israel for an exhibition but as circumstances developed, it was the Israelis who visited Toronto before flying on to Orlando for a second game.

Businessman Gerry Schwartz hosted a dinner in honour of Maccabi Elite Tel Aviv and Jewish community organizations were asked to spread the word and encourage attendance at the game, said Moshe Ronen, co-chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC).

"We felt it was an opportunity for the community to come out at an event that enhances Canada-Israel relations based on sport and competitive spirit," he said.

"CIC believes that opportunities of linking Canada and Israel in a positive way is what we should focus on."

Finding refuge from cancer in a sukkah

By MARC SILVER
Special to The CJN

Four years ago, my wife told me not to build a sukkah. She had a good reason.

In September 2001, Marsha was diagnosed with bilateral breast cancer – a tumour in each breast. Cancer was pretty much running our lives. We were visiting doctors every other day as Marsha tried to settle on a team of physicians and appropriate treatments. And did I mention we were planning our younger daughter's bat mitzvah?

Guest Voice

So Marsha was absolutely right. How could I find a couple of hours to put together a prefab sukkah?

But I didn't listen. Building a sukkah was a family tradition, and I didn't want cancer to take that away. With the help of my two daughters, Maya and Daniela, I put up the structure. When we sat in the sukkah, peering up at the stars through boughs of green overhead, we felt as if we'd found temporary refuge from the breast cancer ordeal.

There were other times I didn't listen to my wife. And in those cases, not listening was a big mistake. Like the day Marsha called me at work to tell me that a blunt radiologist had eyeballed her mammogram and said, "Sure looks like cancer to me." I ignored the anguish in Marsha's voice. I pretended everything was fine. I stayed at work until quitting time. And when I did come home, I still wasn't sure how to listen. My instinct was to try and cheer Marsha up instead of paying attention to how she was really feeling.

As the weeks went by, I honed my listening skills. Listening, I found, can be complicated.

What if your wife says, "You don't have to come to the doctor with me." Maybe she wants to spare you from the inconvenience of taking off from work. Then again, maybe you're not good when it comes to medical matters, and she'd rather have her sister the nurse with her. You can take your wife at her word. Or you can follow the advice of Anne O'Connor, a nurse care co-ordinator at Georgetown University's Lombard Cancer Center. She suggests saying, "I love you and I need to know what's going on. We're in this together."

Listening also means letting your wife speak, and not cutting her off if she wants to talk about how scared she is. Many people think optimism is a cure for cancer. But studies have shown that breast cancer patient who let out all their emotions cope better with the stress of treatment.

Unfortunately, men aren't born listeners. For guys who need a crash course, oncology social worker Patricia Spicer suggests an exercise called "paired sharing." The wife tells her husband what she is feeling, then he repeats it back to her. Then he tells her his thoughts and she echoes them. "It's amazing what you hear," Spicer says. "And what you don't hear. It's eye-opening to think you're parroting your spouse's feelings, only to have your spouse say, 'I never said that.'"

Maybe that's why cancer experts told me that the breast cancer husband's motto should be "shut up and listen."

I could have learned some of the same lessons by turning to the Torah.

In the story of Sarah and Abraham, Abraham is distressed about Sarah's wish to "cast out" Hagar and her son. The Lord's advice to Abraham is, "Whatever Sarah tells you, do as she says."

So there you have it: biblical advice for the breast cancer husband. And the only time you don't have to listen is if she tells you that you don't have to build a sukkah.

"Jews in history"

By JOE KING

Admiral Hyman George Rickover (1900-1986) was the father of the atomic submarine by proving that nuclear sea power was feasible.

After World War II, Rickover was head of the Nuclear Power Division of the U.S. Bureau of Ships. Beginning in 1947, he worked on making a reactor to power the Nautilus, the first nuclear submarine. It was launched in 1954 – the first of more than 150 nuclear-powered vessels.

Rickover was born in 1900 in Russian Poland, but was educated in Chicago and graduated from the U.S. Naval Academy in 1922.

After the war, he convinced Admiral Chester Nimitz, then head of naval operations, that nuclear sea power was feasible. The Nautilus put out to sea in 1954 and did not have to be refuelled for three years, after sailing 62,500 miles. Nuclear power changed naval warfare as the concept was extended from subs to aircraft carriers and other vessels.

Admiral Hyman Rickover inspecting USS Nautilus, the world's first nuclear submarine.

Rickover was outspoken. He once declared: "The Defence Department is already too big and if you let it grow on as it is, it soon will be controlling the country."

And because he had an abrasive personality, he was repeatedly passed over for promotion.

One navy board report indicated, for example, that "he does not have enough all-around experience to warrant his advancement to rear admiral." However, he was promoted to rear admiral in 1953, and named a vice-admiral in 1958.

Nuclear powered warships became a reality in the United States Navy only because of his refusal to accept the decisions of officers senior to him, and he finally became a full admiral in 1973, and nine years later, after a record 63 years of service, was retired.

Rickover twice received the American Congressional Gold Medal, as well as many other honours, in recognition of his input into the development of civilian nuclear power plants.

Mondays with Pat

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Patricia (Pat) has cleaned my place and done my laundry every Monday for the last three years. Two weeks ago, she left me a note stating, "I'll be in touch with you soon, but I'm leaving you the keys for now because you never know what can happen."

I've called her a few times since, but it's been difficult to connect because she doesn't have a phone. I've had to leave a message with her neighbour. Pat has called back a couple of times and left messages. We still haven't spoken.

I'm very sad that Pat won't be coming by my place anymore, or at least that is what I believe she was telling me in her note. I don't know why she decided to stop, but I have a sense she had to, so she could grow differently, maybe become an artist. But I already miss her.

Some people call people like Pat "cleaning ladies," or "maids." I never liked those titles though, because they often make us believe that people who scour and scrub our homes are simpletons, excelling in uncomplicated undertakings like mopping, laundry and dusting.

Pat cleaned my place so she could pay her bills. Her personality and interests, however, are far from simple. She is a proud mother, a native Canadian artist and an erudite political critic with a thought-out worldview shaped, in part, because of time to think while cleaning (like biblical shepherds who developed philosophies of life). She is lovely, charming and frequently intriguing through her descriptive silence, impulsive repartee and earthy consciousness.

When I first met Pat, I noticed right off the bat, she wouldn't walk next to me, but instead a few feet behind me. I figured she was carrying some baggage from another "boss" or authority figures that likely didn't treat her well. I just let her be – and every week when we would walk around my apartment I would slow down just a bit so that we could get a little bit closer. Eventually, we walked side by side.

A lot of times, Pat and I would leave notes for one another with messages having to do with cleaning issues, such as a request to clean my windows or defrost my fridge, but I always felt the notes were more a way of sharing something special between us – J-cloth pen pals. Over time, our friendship grew and the spaces between the words and sentences took on a rich meaning.

Sometimes Pat would write me about a picture I had just painted and would express a raw critique, saying things like, "It's not your best one, but I liked the way you mixed the reds and purples."

When my dog, Max, was alive Pat would write notes like, "The light bulb in the fridge is broken and I bought a new one for $1.98. Don't worry about the money. Oh ya. Max looked so unhappy the moment you went to work. I felt so bad for him."

I started looking forward to coming home on Mondays, to smell the lemon-scented wood polish and read Pat's notes. Their length never varied much and the content was generally something to do with cleaning, a refreshing thought she had during the day and then her signature – Patricia – in a most elegant script.

I was so sad when I read her last note. I'm still trying to find her. I guess a lot of us get really close to the people we pay for services and when they decide to move on, it's sad, because so often you never see them again. Damn, I am so bad with separation. I think Pat isn't great with it, either.

Israel's friends march in Jerusalem

Canadians were among 5,000 Christian pilgrims who marched through the centre of Jerusalem last week in the annual Sukkot Jerusalem March. The march was organized by the International Christian Embassy Jerusalem. The embassy criticized fellow Christians who are spearheading divestment campaigns against Israel and said it would fight such efforts. See related story on page 3. [Israpet photo]

Pressure grows on Assad over Hariri murder

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

DAMASCUS — Waving placards and pictures of their president, tens of thousands of Syrians on Monday protested the UN report implicating him in the death of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri.

"Mr. Mehlis: we are not murderers," read one banner, referring to Detlev Mehlis, the German prosecutor who wrote the report. Organized to show support for the beleaguered government of President Bashar Assad, the demonstration in central Damascus came a day before the UN Security Council was due to debate the report. The United States and Britain were calling for the council to take a firm stand on Syria.

"With our soul and our blood, we redeem you, Bashar," the crowd chanted in Sabe Bahrat Square. The people held up large posters of Bashar and of his father, the late Syrian president Hafez Assad.

"Wake up Arabs, your turn will come soon," read one banner, in an attempt to draw pan-Arab solidarity.

The protesters also shouted slogans against the United States and unfurled banners with messages such as: "Get away from Syria" and "Syria will never be another Iraq."

Meanwhile, in New York, diplomats said the United States prefers not to take far-reaching steps against Damascus in the UN Security Council at this stage, despite strong American condemnations of Syria since last Friday.

Israel, Jordan jointly fight bird flu

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Officials from Israel's Veterinary Service and their Jordanian counterparts agreed on joint efforts to combat avian flu at a meeting last week. The summit took place on the Jordanian side of the Allenby Bridge.

During the three-hour meeting, held at the request of the Jordanians, it was decided that Jordanian veterinarians would attend study sessions at a laboratory for avian diseases at Beit Dagan. The sides also agreed to meet again in three weeks.

The Israeli delegation at the meeting was headed by Dr. Moshe Haimovich, director of the Agriculture Ministry's Veterinary Service, and Dr. Shimon Pokomonsky, who heads the service's avian section. The Jordanians were represented by Dr. Fares Baheit, the head of Jordan's veterinary services, and other specialists.

Israel has also been invited to take part in an emergency European Union meeting in Brussels, sponsored by the World Organization of Animal Health. The meeting, to be held in November, will deal with responses to avian flu.

The meeting on the Allenby Bridge was organized at the request of the Jordanians, who want to find out what steps Israel is taking to prepare for a possible outbreak and spread to humans of the virus.

Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said that Israel and Jordan were trying to forge plans for a joint effort against the flu, since it is considered likely to spread to the Middle East in the near future. Israel would also be happy to co-operate with other countries on this issue, he said.

Several Arab newspapers reported last week that Israeli officials would also meet

Shul Joins Powwow

SASKATOON — Members of the Conservative shul Congregation Agudas Israel in Saskatoon joined in the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations' fourth annual powwow on Oct. 16. It was the latest bridge-building effort between Jews and First Nations since native leader David Ahenakew in 2002 called Jews a "disease" and said Hitler was justified when he "fried six million of those guys."

Meeting Ban Mulled

MARKHAM, Ont. — The town of Markham north of Toronto is considering banning public meetings on major Jewish, Muslim and Hindu holidays after a meeting on a planning issue in Thornhill, an area with many Jews that straddles Markham and neighbouring Vaughan, was held on Rosh Hashanah. Councillor Erin Shapero, who is Jewish, and councillor Khalid Usman, a Muslim, are backing the plan, and town staff have been told to study local demographics and recommend which holidays to observe, the Markham Economist & Sun reported.

MP Won't Run Again

TORONTO — Independent MP Carolyn Parrish, an outspoken critic of Israel, won't run in the next election, she said this month. Parrish, who was ousted from the Liberal caucus after calling Americans "bastards" and stomping on a doll depicting U.S. President George W. Bush, recently sent a report about her visit to "Palestine" to her Mississauga Erindale constituents in which she placed most of the blame for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict on Israel.

CJC Sends Quake Aid

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress and Walter Arbib, president of the Skylink Group of Companies, teamed up last week to send $500,000 in pharmaceutical supplies to victims of the recent earthquake in Pakistan. "The dimensions of this catastrophe are almost beyond comprehension," said CJC president Ed Morgan. "We cannot stand by and do nothing."

Lunch with Rupert?

TORONTO — The Canadian Friends of the Jerusalem College of Technology announced a charity auction to win lunch with media mogul Rupert Murdoch at News Corporation's headquarters in Manhattan. All proceeds will benefit the college. Bidding starts Nov. 3 and ends Nov. 10. Details at www.ebay.com/rupertmurdoch.

Israeli on Visit to Spain IDs Nazi Fugitive

MADRID — An Israeli visiting Spain reportedly helped authorities track down a Nazi war criminal who has hidden in the country for years.

Spanish police expect the imminent arrest of Aribert Heim, whose notorious medical experiments on concentration camp inmates earned him the nickname "Dr. Death," in part thanks to the testimony of an Israeli who spotted the 91-year-old fugitive in Ibiza, Ha'aretz reported last week. According to the newspaper, Heim, considered one of the two most-wanted Nazi war criminals still alive and at large, is believed to be living in the Costa Brava area.

Efraim Zuroff of the Simon Wiesenthal Center said there is concern that Heim, who eluded capture several times before despite a distinctive appearance that includes a facial scar, may have already slipped out of Spain.

Although he never completed medical studies, Heim served as an SS doctor at Mauthausen, Sachsenhausen and Buchenwald, killing hundreds of inmates.

Cossack Meets Rabbi

KIEV — The leader of Ukraine's Cossacks has condemned anti-Semitism and scheduled a conference with Jews on the issue. In an Oct. 13 meeting with Azriel Haikin, one of Ukraine's chief rabbis, on relations between Ukraine's various ethnic groups, Anatoly Shevchenko reportedly condemned anti-Semitism and said Ukrainian Cossacks would promote ethnic and religious tolerance. The pair also agreed to hold a roundtable next month on racism and anti-Semitism. Cossacks, known for their military services to the Russian Empire, have a history of anti-Jewish violence dating to the 17th century.

Driver Gets Settlement

LOS ANGELES — A Jewish bus driver was awarded $20,000 from a Los Angeles transit agency that refused him time off for Shabbat and Jewish holidays. The award stems from a religious discrimination suit brought by the U.S. Justice Department last year on behalf of Henry Asher, 56, against the L.A. County Metropolitan Transportation Authority. In a settlement made public this month, the MTA agreed that drivers who are assigned shifts that conflict with religious observance can take 30 days unpaid leave while waiting for a suitable shift to open up. Asher was hired as a driver trainee in June 2002 and fired a month later after he allegedly missed two work days.

Conference on divesting in Israel cause of concern

Jewish groups say issues may be slowly ebbing away

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

A three-day conference on divesting in Israel, starting this week in Toronto, has drawn the attention of Jewish groups, who say the whole issue of divestment may be slowly ebbing anyway.

The Oct. 26-29 conference is dubbed "A Call for Morally Responsible Investment: A Nonviolent Response to the Israeli Occupation." It is sponsored by Canadian Friends of Sabeel, whose parent group, the Sabeel Ecumenical Liberation Theology Center in Jerusalem, combines a Christian philosophy of liberation with healthy doses of Palestinian nationalism.

Among the conference's major sponsors are the United Church of Canada, the country's largest Protestant denomination.

The opening program on Oct. 26, featuring Jeff Halper, co-ordinator of the Jerusalem-based Israeli Committee Against House Demolitions, takes place at Toronto's Trinity-St. Paul's United Church on Bloor Street.

Canon Naim Ateek, an Anglican clergyman who heads the Sabeel Center in Jerusalem and who has attacked Israel on numerous occasions, is slated to address the gathering twice, once as a keynote speaker at a program at Bloor Street United Church.

Also slated to speak at the gathering are several Jewish peace activists, some of them from Israel, as well as Michael Mandel, a professor at Osgoode Hall Law School.

According to the Friends' website, the conference "seeks to draw together churches, CROs (Church Related Organizations) and NGOs (Non-Governmental Organizations) working for a just peace in Israel-Palestine to explore the emerging non-violent economic strategies to achieve this end (including shareholder initiatives, partial divestment and boycotts.)"

The conference "definitely sends out a morally repugnant message, which is the delegitimization and demonization of Israel," remarked Ruth Klein of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights. "It does not take into account developments on the ground."

Klein said the gathering is "not interested" in peace "but in pushing an agenda, and it's a tired agenda."

"Sabeel, in our view, is a radical wolf in sheep's clothing. It has been the most active [organization] in pushing Protestant churches to look at, and accept, divestment [in Israel] as a policy."

Ateek and Sabeel, he noted, have advocated a one-state solution in the Middle East, and Ateek often uses anti-Semitic imagery in his speeches.

"He speaks of the Israeli government as 'a crucifixion system,' and as 'modern-day Herods,'" Prutschi said. "He does not recognize the right of Jewish sovereignty in Israel."

Prutschi said Canadian Christian churches have largely sidestepped the divestment issue. But the co-sponsorship of the conference by the United Church of Canada "is something that dejects us. It does raise concerns about the direction of the church."

Gail Allan of the United Church of Canada told The CJN that her church's sponsorship of the conference "doesn't imply a stand at this point. Sabeel is one of our partners in the Middle East, and it's our understanding of partnership to accompany our partners."

Allan pointed out that divestment was examined, but turned aside, by the church's national body in 2003. However, "it's a question that's still under discussion."

In Canada, the Roman Catholic Church has not enunciated a position on divestment in Israel.

The Presbyterian Church in Canada also has no policy on the subject, and has said it has not fallen in line with its U.S. counterpart, which passed a resolution on divestment in July of 2004, prompting four other mainline Protestant denominations in the United States to consider similar measures.

Late last year, the Anglican Church of Canada assured CJC that it had no plans to explore divestment "at this time."

Mr. Abbas went to Washington

From the editor's desk

On the very day last week that Palestine Authority President Mahmoud Abbas was scheduled to meet in Washington with U.S. President George W. Bush, the Wall Street Journal published an essay under the Palestinian's name entitled "Is the 'Road Map' at a Dead End?"

In the article, Abbas blamed Israel for all that was wrong in the Palestinians' current political condition. Israel was not fully co-operating with his government, he claimed. In addition, according to Abbas, Israel was undermining the "road map" peace plan. Every ill in the region, short of the hot weather, he cast as Israel's responsibility.

It was a clever attempt by the media-wise Palestinian leader, in advance of his meeting at the White House, to speak directly to the American public – at least to the part of the public that reads the Wall Street Journal – and thereby attempt to place extra pressure on the American president to respond with sympathy to his message.

"Since my democratic election as president of the Palestinian Authority in January," Abbas wrote, "my government has done all in its power to advance the Road Map and live up to our commitments."

The president, however, rejected this over-reaching, patently false statement by Abbas.

The pillar on which Palestine statehood must rest is the abject rejection of terrorism as an instrument of statehood. Thus far, that pillar has not yet risen even to ground level. It does not appear anywhere on the horizon of the dawning state's horizon. Bush knows this as do the leaders of the European Union.

"The way forward," Bush reminded Abbas at the press conference after their meeting, "must begin by confronting the threat that armed gangs pose to a genuinely democratic Palestine."

Yet, time and again, Abbas has explicitly refused to do so, thereby rejecting the very first obligation under the much-referred-to "road map," namely, to dismantle the terror network within Palestinian society.

"I have managed, in the nine months since my election, to create a climate of peace and not a climate of violence amongst Palestinians," Abbas wrote. "Yet this climate of peace needs the help of the U.S. and the international community: For without sustained pressure on the Israeli government to sit down and negotiate, Israel will only bolster those within Palestinian society who do not share the majority's desire for peace."

To be sure, Bush did not only speak to the Palestinians. He also called upon Israel to "continue to work with Palestinian leaders to help improve the daily lives of Palestinians… Israel should not undertake any activity that contravenes its 'road map' obligations or prejudices the final status negotiations with regard to Gaza, the West Bank and Jerusalem. This means that Israel must remove unauthorized posts and stop settlement expansion."

But the "climate of peace" that Abbas touted, Bush knew to be a lie. Armed gangs control the streets. Daytime in the streets of Gaza is treacherous. And nighttime an invitation to death. Palestinian researcher Khaled Duzdar has recently written that "Palestinian towns and villages have been reduced by the anarchy and lawlessness to a simulacrum of Somalia."

On Sunday, Israel arrested some 23 violent fugitives in the West Bank. In one of the arrests, 10 kilos of explosives were confiscated. But one of the arrests poignantly demonstrated the shameless effrontery of Abbas' claim of having established a "climate of peace."

Lt.-Col. Arik Chen, commander of the battalion that affected the arrests told reporters "the wife of the one of the fugitives held her baby with two hands and held a bag with a hand grenade underneath its [the baby's] shirt to hide it from the soldiers. We examined her [the woman] all the while she held on to the baby and we detected that underneath the baby, or inside its clothes really, was a bag with a hand grenade," Chen said. "Right next to the back of the baby!"

But the exploitation of their children to perpetuate violence upon Israelis is a long-standing practice of Palestinian terrorists. Two weeks ago, a 14-year-old was arrested trying to smuggle a bomb into Israel. Last Thursday, Israeli soldiers arrested a 16-year-old Palestinian boy as he tried to smuggle a large mortar shell and two knives through a military checkpoint, the army said.

The incident marked the sixth time in the last two months alone that Palestinians were caught trying to smuggle weapons through that same checkpoint. How many weapons or explosive devices have not been detected?

Abbas concluded his article in the Wall Street Journal thus: "When I meet with President Bush today, I will make only one fundamental request: Grant the Palestinians the freedom they so desperately deserve."

It is neither the U.S. nor Israel that holds back the Palestinians from the freedom they seek and deserve. It is the Palestinian leaders themselves who constantly recoil from the single most important choice they face: to live by the rule of law or by terror.

Schwartz, Reisman give $12M to York region campus

Gerald Schwartz, chair and CEO of Onex Corporation, and his wife Heather Reisman, president and CEO of Indigo Books and Music, signed a contract last Thursday to donate $12 million to help create a new Jewish community centre in the city of Vaughan.

The Schwartz/Reisman Centre will be part of the new Lebovic Community Centre at the corner of Bathurst Street and Weldrick Road.

The Schwartz/Reisman community centre will serve York Region's quickly growing Jewish population of 60,000, as well as other area residents. It will include social, athletic, recreational, cultural and learning facilities.

The Lebovic Campus – an initiative of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign – covers 50 acres of land. In addition to the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, the campus will include schools, social service agencies, parks, and other open spaces.

The Lebovic Campus is one of three being built by UJA Federation in the Greater Toronto Area. The architectural firm of Petroff & Partners has designed the project, which will begin construction in November.

"The Schwartz/Reisman Centre on the Lebovic Campus will be dedicated to building a burgeoning city," said David Engel, chair of the UJA Federation board.

"The centre will be a modern, thriving hub of cultural, educational, recreational, athletic and communal activity that will offer its users a lifelong learning experience. We are grateful to Gerry and Heather for their generosity."

Officials with the Tomorrow Campaign, chaired by Schwartz and Larry Tanenbaum, describe it as the largest not-fof-profit Jewish community infrastructure project in North American history, with a goal of raising more than $250 million for community projects in the Toronto area.

Holocaust Education Week marks its 25th year

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Holocaust Education Week, which marks its 25th anniversary this year, isn't just for the Jewish community, says Joan Shapero, who is co-chairing the annual event with Honey Carr for the third consecutive year.

That point was driven home to her last year when she attended a Holocaust Education Week event co-sponsored for the first time by Kulanu Toronto, a campus group for gay students under the auspices of Hillel of Greater Toronto. More than 80 people – "quite a cross-section, [including] students and faculty" – attended, said Shapero.

Their positive response "proved to me how important this variety of programming and alternate programming is," she said.

This year's Holocaust Education Week, which runs from Oct. 27 to Nov. 9, has a total of more than 110 programs, most of which are held in the GTA. As well, Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario is co-sponsoring programs in Kingston, Thunder Bay, Newmarket, Sudbury, Guelph, Barrie and Peterborough. Last year, between 14,000 and 15,000 people attended the programs.

This week, Holocaust Education Week – which long ago outgrew the confines of a seven-day timespan – kicks off at Temple Sinai (Oct. 27, 7:30 p.m.) with a program about Protestant villagers in Chambon-sur-Lignon, France, who saved 5,000 Jews. Keynote speaker Pierre Sauvage, an Emmy-winning filmmaker and child survivor, was born there and made a documentary about the villagers called Weapons of the Spirit.

"We always try to have a variety of topics, so we'll appeal to a broad cross-section of the general public," said Shapero. She cited several musical, artistic and theatrical events, including a concert by violinist Moshe Hammer and singer Shoshana Friedman (Wagman Centre, Nov. 1, 7:30 p.m.).

On Oct. 30, an exhibit will premier at the Koffler Centre of the Arts. "Images from the Past: The Children of the Vanished World" features Roman Vishniac photographs coloured by artist Eitan Levy, who will attend the opening.

Other programs include "Hard Lessons from the Rwandan Genocide: Earning the Courage to Care and to Act" with Major Brent Beardsley, at Tyndale University College & Seminary (Nov. 8, 7 p.m.); the "Sephardi Experience of the Holocaust," with Mehmet Ülkümen of the United Nations, whose father rescued 42 Jewish families from Greece in 1944 (Sephardic Kehila Centre, Oct. 30, 7:30 p.m.); "The Power of Language – How We Talk About the Holocaust" (Shaar Shalom Synagogue, Oct. 30, 7:30 p.m.) and "Homosexuals in Austria: Nazi Persecution and their Long Struggle for Rehabilitation" with Kurt Krickler, co-founder of Austria's first gay/lesbian organization (519 Community Centre, Nov. 3, 7:30 p.m.).

Holocaust Education Week will close with a Kristallnacht commemoration featuring survivor and author Gerda Weissman Klein (Adath Israel Congregation, Nov. 9, 7:30 p.m.)

Shapero noted that Villa Charities – an umbrella for organizations in the Italian community including the Columbus Centre and Villa Colombo Services for Seniors – is co-sponsoring a program on "Unknown Italian Heroes: Resistance and Rescue in Italy" with book translator Father Marco Bagnarol, who is working on the memoirs of the former Chief Rabbi of Rome, and survivors Bianca Schlesinger and Esther Bem (Nov. 8, 7:30 p.m., Shaarei Tefillah Congregation)

"I think this will be an exciting program," said Shapero. "People are working together. This year we've had more teaming up of organizations."

Carr said if the programs can make a difference, particularly for young people, then "maybe we'll have a better generation in the future for all mankind."

As in years past, there will be a number of survivor testimonies, including for the first time a French-language talk by Samuel Shene at École secondaire Mgr-de-Charbonnel (Nov. 9, 10 a.m.).

For more information, call 416-635-2883, ext. 301, and for a complete program, including last-minute changes, go to www.holocausteducationweek.com. Admission to most programs is free, but a voluntary donation of at least $3 per person per event is suggested.

The Nov. 5 program at Beth Tzedec Congregation with Vivien Spitz ("Doctors from Hell") was cancelled due to illness, and a replacement program was in the works as of late last week.

Women help New Orleans family that saved them from Hurricane Katrina

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

With seven family members packed into a windowless van, strewn with glass and mere blocks from streaming floodwaters, the Derry clan had every reason to look out only for themselves as they fled Hurricane Katrina's wrath.

But when they spotted two stranded strangers on a New Orleans street, they instinctively lent a hand.

For Robin Raxlin, 29, and her friend Anna Skrip, 27, both of Toronto, the Derrys were lifesavers that fateful day.

"This is what the people are like in New Orleans," said Raxlin. "They just have this spirit and heart that I have never seen before."

Now, the two social workers want to show their gratitude by helping hurricane victims.

From canvassing friends and family to office raffles, Raxlin and Skrip have become active fundraisers, racking up $15,000 and counting for the Derrys and, hopefully, other hurricane victims.

"We feel compelled to help these people... start the rebuilding process," Raxlin said.

"They gave us stability in a time of sheer terror, so let's give them some income to rebuild."

Raxlin was almost moved to tears as she recalled the events that led to the serendipitous encounter with the Derrys.

She and Skrip went to New Orleans in late August for some good times, which is what they enjoyed at first.

But by Aug.27, when Mayor Ray Nagin called for a complete evacuation ahead of the looming hurricane, their trip was doomed.

"It was an escalation of pain, anxiety and fear," Raxlin said.

"There were no rental cars, trains or buses. We called every single airline and everything was taken... How were we going to get out?"

The duo stocked up on what was left at the Walgreen's drugstore and sought comfort from locals, such as Ryan Lewis, a doorman at a nearby restaurant.

"He started calming us down, gave us his number and told us to call if we needed anything," Raxlin recalled.

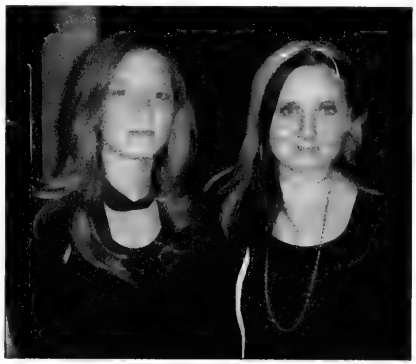
The morning before the hurricane struck, the women were awakened by a call from Raxlin's mother, who insisted that they leave.

"That's when we both got really upset," Raxlin said.

The hotel they were staying at decided to transfer about 400 hotel guests, staff and their families to another hotel. The night at the new hotel was long and sleepless.

"The wind was howling, windows were being smashed, alarms were going off. There was no sleep," Raxlin said.

"I saw a car fly by and a building toppled on top of cars."



Robin Raxlin and Anna Skrip

By Aug. 30, the hurricane's fury had left the city and everyone in it destitute.

That morning, Raxlin and Skrip had another fortunate encounter.

A television reporter from Fox News alerted the women that the levees protecting the city from flooding had broken. No one in the hotel had given them the same warning.

Raxlin and Skrip gathered whatever belongings they could and asked hotel staff what to do.

"You need to get out, you need to get out," is all they heard, without any explanation of how to leave.

Outside, a cameraman told Raxlin that floodwaters were three blocks away.

Just then, another stroke of luck.

"All of a sudden, the Evelyn Derry family pulls up in this old van, with all the windows blasted out and glass everywhere," Raxlin recalled.

"We were just thrown in."

The Derrys' home was totally destroyed and all they had were the clothes on their backs.

Raxlin and Skrip, with their luggage and plane tickets, sat on shards of glass in the van, which was rapidly running out of gas.

Tremor in Damascus

Though no earthquake struck the region last week, a trembling must nevertheless have been felt in the president's palace in Damascus. Chief United Nations investigator Detlev Mehlis released his interim findings on Friday in the Feb. 14 car bomb murder in Beirut in which former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri and some two dozen others lost their lives.

The Jerusalem Post reported that it obtained an unedited copy of Mehlis's report, which implicates a number of high Syrian officials including Syrian President Bashar Assad's brother-in-law, Gen. Assef Shawkat, the head of Syrian intelligence, and Assad's brother, Maher, the commanding general of the presidential guard brigade.

For reasons best known to Mehlis, however, he deleted their names and those of three other top Syrians from the official copy that was released to the public. But the investigation was thorough. The 54-page report attests to Mehlis's sterling effort. In four months, he interviewed more than 400 people and reviewed more than 60,000 documents. His main conclusion is that the evidence pointed to Syrian and Lebanese complicity in the murders. He also expressed skepticism that the Syrian and Lebanese intelligence services were unaware of the plot.

"Given the infiltration of Lebanese institutions and society by the Syrian and Lebanese intelligence services working in tandem, it would be difficult to envisage a scenario whereby such a complex assassination plot could have been carried out without their knowledge," he wrote.

Not surprisingly, the Syrians dismissed the report, saying it was merely presumptions and allegations. Syrian Foreign Ministry adviser Riyad Dawoodi said simply, "There's no proof." And of course he also implied that Israel was behind the killing.

When he received word of the report's findings, U.S. President George Bush said it was "deeply disturbing." He is determined to place the unfinished matter on the agenda of the Security Council. It was scheduled to be discussed this week.

The investigation is not complete and the UN will undoubtedly urge Syria to co-operate fully with investigators and allow Syrian nationals to be interviewed fully and appropriately.

In the immediate wake of the report's release, Lebanese officials arrested Lebanese Islamic fundamentalist leader Mahmoud Abdel, who is specifically named in the Mehlis report as a suspect in the planning of the car bombing.

Even though the names of the high Syrian officials were omitted from the interim report, the trail of evidence appears to be leading ineluctably to the president's palace in Damascus. Depending upon the decisions taken by the Security Council, Bashar Assad's regime could be in danger. At the very least, it will be shaken by the tremors caused by the Mehlis report. It falls now to the West to harness the aftershocks of those tremors to permanent, positive effect.

Happy living in Israel

Rejoice with me! I am well into a new year – a new year for myself and my 56th year in Israel!

My life here has been a full one, a complete success in every way. So at first I lived in a two-man tent surrounded by huge boulders, bushes of thorns and head-high cacti, but today there are well-tended lawns and flowers, tall, colourful trees, large houses and huge public gardens. What more can anyone want?

The state, too, is growing – there are now more than five million Jews living here. Looking back, it is unbelievable! After 2,000 years of only memories, we are once again a majority people and living, and not by coincidence, in the very same land where our ancestors fought for freedom against the mighty Roman Empire.

Before coming to Israel we all led a double life: we were straddled across the two sides of a hyphen – one side being a Jew and the other side bearing the name of the country in which we just then happened to be living. Now we no longer feel the compulsion to be similar to our neighbours, to be completely like them – which was anyway difficult because they were often quite different from one another. We truly wanted to blend into the community and to be fully accepted as one of them, and all the time we knew it was, by them and by us, only a pretence. Here in Israel we are not handcuffed by this hyphen.

Day school fees

The article "Fees up at Toronto's Jewish schools" (CJN, Oct. 6) is a perfect example of how the leaders of our community are beginning to accept the idea of a Canada without Jewish life.

It stated that "enrolment at Associated [Hebrew Day Schools] declined in both elementary school and preschool but not as much as officials had feared."

Not as much as they had feared? Any loss is still a loss. Growth should be the number 1 priority.

The Jews of Canada deserve better than community leaders who are happy to see decreased enrolment.We should demand answers from our community leaders, and ask why they have let this happen to us. Otherwise, we will continue to receive sub-par results.

Shuls for communities out of mainstream

We at Congregation Shir Libeynu welcome the new spiritual leader of the Danforth Jewish Circle (DJC), Rabbi Eliza Kukla, to Toronto ("Danforth Jewish Circle welcomes new spiritual leader", CJN, Sept. 29).

However, we wish to correct Rabbi Kukla's assertion that "Downtown Toronto is an underserved Jewish area, especially those communities that are interfaith and gay and lesbian – communities that don't fit into the mainstream." Indeed, for 10 years, Shir Libeynu, an unaffiliated liberal congregation, has served these communities very well. Several hundred people participate in our joyful and innovative High Holy Days services, which are conducted by Dr. Aviva Goldberg, our ritual leader. A diverse group of people takes part in the study groups, celebrations and services we hold in midtown and downtown Toronto throughout the year.

Our inclusive and egalitarian congregation provides warmth and support to individuals and families from a variety of backgrounds or those who have recently discovered or rediscovered an interest in their Judaism. Many Shir Libeynu participants claim that after years of searching, they have finally found someplace they can be comfortable.

Rabbi Kukla's presence in Toronto will serve to enrich our already vibrant city. Mazel tov to her and to the DJC.

'My father did not abandon the Torah'

By ELI RUBENSTEIN

Among the lasting images from Hurricane Katrina is the one of a bearded man clutching a Torah as he waded waist deep in water through the pews of a waterlogged New Orleans synagogue.

The photo was featured prominently in several Jewish newspapers and was e-mailed around the world countless times.

The prevalence of the image bespeaks an almost indescribable affection and devotion that the Jewish people profess for the Torah.

Jewish tradition maintains the Torah is the ultimate in truth, the eternal word of God, endlessly profound, wise and wondrous. Jewish mystics have described the Torah as God's love letters to the Children of Israel. More historically minded Jews see the Torah as the beginnings of the evolution of the Jewish people. Yet others see the Torah as the constitution of the Jewish people, the bedrock from which all Jewish values ultimately stem.

Our enemies, too, have recognized the Torah as a sacred artifact to the Jewish people and have tried to use this knowledge to further increase the suffering of our people.

My Aunt Gaby of Montreal tells the story of the Torah that her family donated to the local shul in Debrecen, Hungary, just before they were deported during the Holocaust. When they returned to their ransacked home after their liberation, virtually none of their possessions remained. To add insult to injury, however, the vandals had made sure to tear the parchment of the donated Torah into tiny strips and scatter the torn fragments like confetti throughout the entire house.

Countless other Torahs faced a similar fate during the Holocaust – but not all.

Several years ago, a member of my synagogue, Felicia Kopelman Cukier, approached me to recount a remarkable story.

During the war, her father Mauricy (Moshe Pesach) Kopelman had hidden his wife Rose and his two small children, Felicia and Ruth, with gentile families in two villages near Warsaw. To provide the funds to finance their stay, he sold his wife's jewelry to Nachum Sakiel (a Jew with the necessary connections in Warsaw).

Mauricy continued to live on the gentile side of Warsaw with false papers. One day, he came across a Torah scroll for sale by a street vendor. Not wanting to reveal his true identity or the real object of his interest, he engaged the pedlar in idle conversation before broaching the question about this strange object the pedlar was selling. The pedlar patiently explained to him that it was a Jewish scroll of no real use to anyone now – but since it was written on parchment, it was ideal material for fixing leaky roofs!

Mauricy casually observed that his roof was, in fact, in need of repair. (Mauricy, of course, was living hand to mouth and had no roof to speak of.) He then purchased the Torah, and not wanting to walk through occupied Warsaw with a Torah scroll in his hands, made arrangements to have it picked up by someone else. (A non-Jewish associate of Mr. Sakiel did this later.)

Mauricy did not survive the Holocaust. His wife and two children did manage to escape Hitler's grasp and immigrated to Canada, settling in Montreal and later Toronto.

Nachum Sakiel also survived the Holocaust, and eventually moved to New York, where he set up an antique shop with his son Larry. Over the years, N. Sakiel & Sons sold thousands of objects, but there was one artifact they would not part with: the sefer Torah they brought with them from Poland, the same Torah that Mauricy Kopelman had saved from the Holocaust. Despite suggestions that the Torah should be given to a synagogue, Nachum Sakiel had become convinced that the Torah was his talisman – it had saved his life and he could never part with it.

And here the story seemed to end.

Felicia's family lost contact with the Sakiels, but they often wondered about the fate of the Torah that their beloved husband and father had saved during the Holocaust.

Since I travelled to New York frequently, Felicia suggested that perhaps I could locate the Sakiels and learn what happened to the Torah.

Two years later, I found myself with a free morning in New York City. I looked up the name "N. Sakiel & Son" on the Internet and discovered a listing for the same name on 2nd Avenue in Manhattan. But when I arrived in the store, I found a large complex with possibly 20 different antique vendors, none with the name N. Sakiel & Son. After speaking to several of the vendors, and on the verge of giving up, I finally learned that Nachum Sakiel had passed away many years ago and that his son Larry was severely ill. The store had closed down two years earlier. Who knew if he was even still alive?

"Yes, he may be still alive," someone suggested, "living with his second wife, a Polish woman, a few blocks away. But if he is, he is very ill."

I decided to make my way to the address I was given

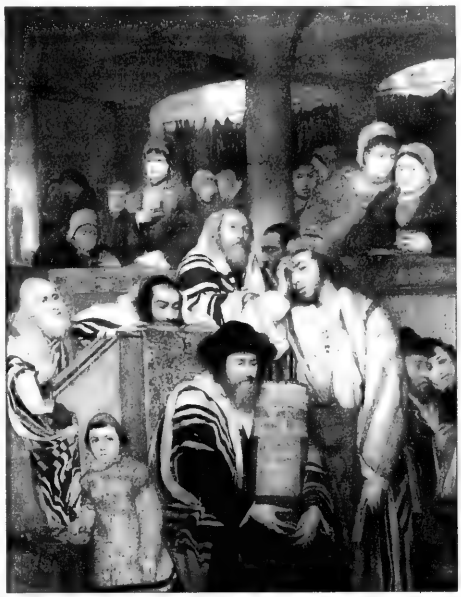
I found the building, and indeed Larry and Helen Sakiel were listed as tenants. I rang the apartment, and a woman with a thick Polish accent answered. In vain I tried to explain the purpose of my visit, but the language barrier was too great. Finally, more out of frustration than comprehension, she blurted out: "Just come up!"

Helen Sakiel greeted me warmly in the doorway. But try as I might, I still could not explain to her who I was and why I was there.

"Oh, you must be a friend of Larry's," she concluded. "Come in and see him."

She led me into his room, where an elderly man lay under a thin blanket, blinking at me incomprehensibly. "Larry, your friend is here to see you."

Then looking at me she said, "Speak to him."



The Torah, the core of Jewish ritual and tradition, preciously embraced, as depicted by Mauryce Gottlieb in his painting Jews Praying in the Synagogue on Yom Kippur.

"What language does he speak?" I asked.

"He used to speak many languages before he had Alzheimer's. Now he doesn't speak at all. He just lies in bed," she replied, with a mixture of compassion and resignation in her voice.

Then she left the room.

Finally, Helen returned to the room and I immediately resolved to clear up the confusion.

"Mrs. Sakiel, I am afraid there has been a mix-up. I am not a friend of Larry's – I have never met him before. The real purpose of my visit was to find a Torah saved from the Holocaust by a friend of Larry's father during the war. But since Larry's father is no longer here, and since Larry cannot speak or understand anything, I am afraid that I have come to the end of my search for the Torah."

There was a pause. Larry continued to stare at me with his large, uncomprehending eyes.

Then Helen touched my arm. "I know all about the Torah," she said softly. "We still have it – it is safe. Larry, like his father, would never give it away."

I was stunned. Immediately, we called Felicia in Toronto to relate the good news. When Helen explained to Felicia that Larry's will stated that, after his death, the Torah would be donated to the Fifth Avenue Synagogue in Manhattan, Felicia asked if her father's name could be included on the mantle that would cover the Torah. Helen happily agreed.

When Helen passed the phone to me, Felicia's first words to me were: "Finally, my father's memory will have a resting place."

There are several postscripts to this story. Felicia's mother, Rose Kopelman, passed way in 2004, but not before she was comforted to learn that the Torah her husband saved from the Shoah would one day be housed in a synagogue. Later that year, Larry Sakiel died. Helen made good on her vow: the Torah was donated to the Fifth Avenue Synagogue and, following its repair, was to be placed in the Ark, with the names of Moshe Pesach Kopelman, and Nachum and Larry Sakiel, woven into the mantle.

On my next trip to New York, I called Rabbi Yaakov Kermaier of the Fifth Avenue Synagogue to seek permission to view the Torah.

When I first opened the scroll, I found myself reading this passage in Deuteronomy: "Neither is [the Torah] beyond the sea, that thou shouldest say: 'Who shall go over the sea for us, and bring it unto us, and make us to hear it, that we may do it?' But the word is very near unto thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it."

Indeed this Torah had been far away, across the seas, in a far off land, abandoned and on the verge of being desecrated and destroyed.

But through the initial perseverance of one man during the Holocaust, the efforts of others who followed, and the dedication of his family, this Torah will once again be honoured and venerated.

Instead of being reduced for use as coarse building material, it will now be read from, fussed over, held and embraced. And on this Simchat Torah, and for many more to come, the Torah will be held high and danced with joyously by young and old alike. And the names of those who saved the Torah will be forever and deservedly remembered with gratitude.

I will leave the last words to Felicia Kopelman Cukier. In summarizing the miraculous chain of events that took place, she wrote: "The Talmud states 'I will forgive my people for abandoning me, but I will not forgive them for abandoning my Torah.' My father did not abandon the Torah."

Eli Rubenstein is religious leader of Congregation Habonim, a Toronto shul founded by Holocaust survivors, and national director of March of the Living.

Opinions

More than just Israel bashing

As reported in the Sept. 29 issue of The CJN ("Meeting on chief's Israel trip ends in chaos"), a recent open forum convened by the Hamilton Police Services Board about Chief Brian Mullan's trip to Israel last March was prematurely terminated once it became obvious that the increasingly venomous outbursts by successive speakers would be impossible to control.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

That such a gathering was doomed from the outset should not have been too difficult to predict. One had only to look at the nature of the complaints against Mullan to realize that more was going on than merely a concern about the use of taxpayers' money or the merits or demerits of supporting such initiatives in general.

Four days before the public session, the Community Coalition Against Racism (CCAR), one of the two principal complainants – the other was Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights – issued a press release detailing its position on Mullan's visit.

Three specific themes underlined its complaint.

Firstly, CCAR charged that the chief's experience would inevitably "translate into racial profiling of Arabs and Muslims in Hamilton." Secondly, it said his trip "has alienated the support for police of a large portion of Hamilton's fast growing Arab and Muslim population." And thirdly, it referred to what it termed "repugnant Israeli policing methods," which it said "include home invasions without warrants, arrest without charges, indefinite detention without trial, home demolitions, curfews, selective assassinations, and shooting to kill suspects."

"Which of these methods," the group asked, "do the taxpayers want to see imported into Hamilton"?

It was precisely this kind of bizarre and outrageously distorted invective that was repeatedly expressed and liberally embellished by four of the first five speakers.

As a followup to the aborted meeting, the board scheduled a closed hearing that would only accept written submissions.

But inasmuch as this recent incident has sent shock waves through the city's Jewish neighbourhoods and drawn stern criticism from the broader community and the mainstream media, there is another dimension that we dare not ignore.

It relates to an increasing number of instances across Canada where groups aligned with the Arab lobby have targeted public figures who choose to visit Israel or who are seen to take pro-Israel positions. Through manipulation and intimidation, the intention of such groups is to make life so uncomfortable for those who support Israel that their allegiances might weaken or even collapse.

It's the old boycott ploy with a different façade, and it needs to be confronted head on – whether by the police services board in Hamilton or in any other setting where its machinations become evident.

Turkish coffee with an Armenian

"An irreversible momentum exists now," George was telling me, "and it's only a matter of time before everybody formally acknowledges that it was a 'shoah' [he was deliberately using the Hebrew term for 'holocaust'] that the Turks committed against us. Germany, Canada, Argentina – many governments have already passed resolutions to the effect, even though Turkey stubbornly insists that the deaths were merely a consequence of war. They won't even admit to more than 300,000 fatalities."

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

We were squeezed into a miniscule Old City café right by the Jaffa Gate. George, a leading lay figure in the tiny Israeli Armenian community, was briefing me on the recent achievements of the long campaign to gain worldwide affirmation of the genocidal nature of the systematic massacres of some 1.5 million ethnic Armenians carried out by the Turkish regime in 1915.

I took a sip from my strong Turkish coffee, nodded, and said, "So 90 years of persistence have, at long last, paid off."

"And the irony," George continued, "is that we are the indirect beneficiaries of the internal dilemmas of Europe. The European Union is conditioning Turkish admission on a full confession of responsibility for the crimes. Their hope, believe it or not, is that the Turks will actually refuse to do so." He laughed.

"You see, that way they, the European nations will have cleansed their own consciences while at the same time furnishing a perfectly legitimate excuse for keeping a large Muslim country out of their cozy club."

"It's looking good," I said.

George hesitated a moment, planning what he wanted to say and how he would say it.

"Yes and no. What about Israel? It's only reasonable to assume that of all the countries, the Jewish state would have been out front on this issue. Right?"

He studied my face for a reaction.

"Who, if not you, can know what our nation suffered? We both lost a third of our populations. Are you aware, for instance, that the Armenian genocide doesn't get mentioned in Israeli school textbooks, and that the Israeli government has caved into Turkish pressure by failing to come out with a formal acknowledgement of the crime?"

I was uneasy. "Realpolitik," I mumbled diffidently. "Turkey is our ally, the only Muslim country that we enjoy truly warm and cordial relations with. It's purely and simply a matter of a little country's survival in a cruel world."

"I guess so," George said compliantly, not wanting to press the matter further.

"Don't get me wrong," he went on. "Plenty of individual Jews have been among our greatest champions. By the way, Mein Kampf is a hot bestseller in Turkey these days. Wonderful friends you pick!"

I squirmed out of the tight corner. "So what's the prevailing mood among the local Armenian community in light of recent successes?"

His reply stunned me. "A great emptiness, a vacuum. In a way, you see, our struggle had become synonymous with our identity. Only now are we taking time to reassess, to fully appreciate the extent of the tragedy, the dimensions of the loss. I'm even wondering how we go about preserving our sense of peoplehood in the future."

"Why don't you just take a lesson from us?" I asked. "Work to keep the sense of tragedy alive – museums, academic courses, a literature, visits to the killing fields, memorial days, movies, websites, institutions, you name it – a whole culture of reminiscence and despair."

He was listening attentively, saying nothing. "And then," I added, "there is Israel, our homeland, another centre of national gravity. The Holocaust, of course, gives it added constructive meaning and poignancy. You now have your own Israel, an independent Armenia."

"Except that in our case," he lamented, "we've lost control over most of what was our patrimony. It's part of Turkish sovereign territory."

He shook his head. "We'll never get it back. The lion's portion of our ancient kingdom, scene of our greatness is gone forever. All that's left us is a sliver of rocky landscape on the margins of our history."

"Welcome to the club of drastically shrinking homelands," I joked.

"Yes," George grinned, "the tribulations of little peoples."

Will Syria join the new Mideast?

According to press reports, the U.S. government is looking for candidates to replace Syrian President Bashar Assad. Although I am basically happy with my current job (the pay could be better), I briefly considered submitting my resume to the CIA, the White House, or whoever is in charge of executive recruiting for collapsing Middle East dictatorships in Washington these days.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The position has many interesting challenges, such as putting some oomph into the moribund Soviet-style Syrian economy; completing the restoration of Lebanese sovereignty; halting support for Hezbollah, Palestinian terror, Iraqi insurgents, etc.; and ending 58 years of war against Israel. And the commute from Damascus to Jerusalem is not too bad – a few hours by armoured car, or few minutes by military jet.

Also on the plus side, there are minimal qualifications. The current jobholder doesn't have much more experience in ruling Syria than anyone else. Bashful Bashar was forced into the dictator-in-waiting position after his older brother Basil totalled his car, and himself, on one of Syria's highways. Before that, Bashar had spent a quiet few years in London, enrolled in optometry school and hanging out with other Syrians. But Bashar learned quickly. He was rapidly promoted from private to general in the Syrian army and was chosen unanimously by the ruling clique to take over when his father died.

Indeed, he began on a positive note, and Bashar was known as "the Internet Assad" when he punched a few holes in Syria's iron curtain that were quickly resealed. Since then, the Syrian leadership seems to have been in a daze, lurching from one foolish decision to the next.

Father Hafez projected a ruthless calm, enabling him to order the deaths of thousands of Muslim Brotherhood members in the city of Hama following protests. But Assad Sr. also recognized the limits of his power, and he knew when to bend to avoid being hit by a superior force.

In contrast, Bashar's regime is easily twisted by gusts from Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad, Hamas and Iraqi insurgents. In Lebanon, Bashar's thugs missed the shifting winds, including co-ordinated pressure from Washington and Paris (the only issue on which U.S. President George W. Bush and French President Jacques Chirac agree). Instead of bending, the circle around Assad escalated tensions with heavy-handed assassinations, including former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri, signalling panic rather than control.

The ensuing investigation, backed by U.S. threats of military action, has forced Syria to retreat, as highlighted by the suicide of the interior minister and former secret police head in Beirut. And Lebanon has been given the opportunity to regain its freedom – a huge setback for the Assad regime.

At the same time, the Syrian economy remains closed and moribund, regime change is on the agenda, and the search is on for a replacement for Assad. But with Syria's legacy of long, unchallenged domination by the minority Alawite Islamic sect, there are no credible opposition movements or good candidates ready to take over.

Unlike Egypt, where there is tentative movement towards political competition, anyone in Syria who thought in such terms was silenced many years ago. In many ways, Syrian society is still tribal, and real party-based politics are a long way off. As a result, if the Assad dynasty has reached the end of the line, some close observers of developments in Damascus are predicting a transition to an "Alawite light" regime. Instead of a Syrian big bang, and the uncertainty or even violence it would bring, a more likely scenario is limited continuity, with a gradual opening up of the economy and society.

"Alawite light" may be the least bad alternative. (So much for my job application.) Instead of using its minimal resources for North Korean missiles, second-hand chemical weapons, and co-operation with Iran in helping Hezbollah, a kinder, gentler Syria would mark a major step forward. Another source of anti-Semitism would be removed, and without backing from Damascus, Palestinian terror groups would lose even more influence. Although daily bus service from Jerusalem to Damascus could still take some time, Israel and Lebanon would be happy to have a government in Syria that focuses on improving the lives of its citizens.

The N.Y. Times downplayed the Holocaust

America's greatest daily newspaper, The New York Times, fell short of the mark in its coverage of the Holocaust and the events leading up to it. This is not exactly hot-off-the-press news. The critique has been bruited about for many years. But with the publication of Laurel Leff's Buried by The Times (Cambridge University Press), an impassioned first-class work of research, no one will ever doubt its veracity.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Leff, a former reporter and editor, argues that the Times basically treated the persecution and murder of European Jews as a secondary story, never giving it the continuous attention or prominent play it deserved.

From September 1939, the outbreak of World War II, to May 1945, the unconditional surrender of Nazi Germany, the Times published 1,186 stories about the subject, or 17 per month. On the face of it, this is not a bad record. But when you delve into the details, the picture is rather different.

The unfolding story of the Holocaust made the Times' front page just 26 times, but never in back-to-back fashion and never in the right-hand column reserved for the day's most important news, and only in six of those stories were Jews identified as the primary victims.

And incredibly enough, the Times banned letters to the editor on the rise of Nazism in Germany. The officially stated reason was that the paper received too many such letters, but the real reason, Leff speculates, is that they would open the door to commentary on the deteriorating situation of German Jews.

Given its importance in American journalism, the Times, owned by Jews of German ancestry, had a critical role in shaping coverage of the Holocaust by other newspapers in the United States. They, too, downplayed it.

There are objective reasons why this was the case, Leff observes. False atrocity stories about Germany during World War I bred skepticism among hard-boiled editors. Carnage on a global scale in World War II made it harder to recognize the travails of Jews. Newspaper proprietors, taking their lead from the U.S. government, feared that a surfeit of coverage would alienate Americans loath to fight a war on behalf of Jews.

With a corps of 30 correspondents based throughout Europe, far more than any other newspaper, the Times certainly had the manpower to cover the story properly. That it did not stems from a decision by the Sulzberger family, which published the Times.

Wary of claims levelled by American isolationists that Jews would lure the U.S. into a war to help their persecuted brethren, the Sulzbergers were reluctant to engage in what might be perceived as "special pleading." And in this connection, assimilated Jews such as Arthur Hays Sulzberger, the publisher, did not wish to be seen emphasizing Jewish suffering or accused of dual loyalty. Sulzberger was particularly concerned that if the Times overplayed the story, it might be perceived as a "Jewish" newspaper, or aggravate existing anti-Semitism, which was quite pervasive in the 1930s and '40s.

He was therefore philosophically opposed to underlining the unique position of Jews in Nazi-occupied Europe. Consequently, the Times tended to place stories about Jews inside the newspaper, to universalize their plight in front-page stories and editorials and to prevent Jewish employees from reaching the most prominent editorial positions. As well, company policy dictated that reporters whose first names were too Jewish-sounding had to use initials in their bylines.

Sulzberger was adamantly opposed to Germany's persecution of Jews. This is absolutely clear. Yet he was equally against the proposition that Jews should exert special efforts to help fellow Jews. In a letter to a reader Leff unearthed, Sulzberger wrote, "A minority, it seems to me, cannot save itself through its minority status but can only be successful if it can, with integrity, merge its cause with a larger movement."

In line with his world view, Sulzberger was an ardent adversary of Zionism. In his opinion, Palestine was not a suitable haven for Jews. He endorsed Britain's 1939 White Paper, which drastically limited Jewish immigration to Palestine. "I do not believe Jews are a race," he said. "I do not believe they are a people."

Like his friend Judah Magnes, an American Zionist, he was in favour of a binational state in Palestine. After the war, however, Sulzberger grudgingly supported the partition of Palestine. But he neither visited Israel nor felt emotionally attached to it. As he put it, " I feel no closer to the state of Israel than I do to Britain or China."

The St. Louis incident, a durable symbol of the Jewish refugee crisis, was one of the first tests of the Times' policy on Jews.

A Hamburg-American cruise ship, the St. Louis set off from Germany in the spring of 1939, filled with 900 German Jewish refugees seeking refuge abroad. They were turned away by Cuba and the United States, but were accepted by several European countries.

The Times carried stories on the St. Louis, but its only official comment appeared two days after the vessel returned to Europe. Astonishingly, the editorial did not identify the refugees as Jews, nor did it call on Washington to admit them.

Arthur Hays Sulzberger

In response to anti-Semitic legislation introduced by Slovakia, Romania, Hungary and Bulgaria in 1940 and '41, the Times ran short, inside stories. When correspondent Joseph Levy filed a story in May 1944 predicting that Hungary was preparing for "the annihilation of Hungarian Jews by the most fiendish methods," editors placed it on page five. Another story that reported the killing of 100,000 Hungarian Jews in Auschwitz was given similar treatment.

Arthur Krock

The paper ran a story about the Warsaw ghetto in Poland, but never followed up with additional reporting or an editorial. The news that three million Polish Jews had been murdered appeared in a page seven story.

The virtual destruction of the Jewish community in Greece was reported by the Times in a three-paragraph blurb on page 14, while the decimation of Dutch Jewry was summed up in a page seven story.

From June 1941 to December 1942, the Nazis slaughtered 1.5 million Jews in the Soviet Union. The Times carried 17 stories about these massacres, and only five of them identified the victims as Jews.

Leff notes that the Jewish press in the United States provided much better coverage of these events than the exalted Times.

Cyrus Leo Sulzberger

For a long time, the Times subscribed to the Jewish Telegraphic Service, known as the JTA. But in 1937, Sulzberger cancelled its subscription, finding the idea of "Jewish news" offensive and the service untrustworthy. By severing ties with the JTA, Leff remarks, the Times dispensed with one of the most valued sources of information inside Poland. Yet Sulzberger published official German decrees, she points out.

The Times relied heavily on the wire services for stories on internal developments in Germany, even though that ran counter to its general practice.

"The fact that the Times tended to use wire service stories for its reporting on the condition of Jews in Germany made it less likely that the articles would receive prominent display," she concludes." News organizations have a decided preference for their own staff-produced work," she adds.

In their response to the Holocaust, some of the Times' columnists were conspicuously silent.

Cyrus Leo Sulzberger, its foreign affairs columnist, was stationed in critical regions before and during the war: Austria in 1938 as Germany annexed that country; the Balkans in 1940 and the first half of 1941 as savage pogroms broke out in Romania; the Soviet Union in the second half of 1941 as the Wehrmacht made ominous territorial gains; and the Middle East in 1943 and 1944 as Palestine became one of the last havens for Jewish refugees.

Yet Sulzberger, a nephew of one of the Times' owners and an assimilationist, all but ignored the fate of the Jews in those countries.

The same can be said of Arthur Krock, the Washington bureau chief. An apparently self-hating Jew, Krock wrote nearly 1,200 columns during the war, but not a single one mentioned the persecution of Jews.

According to Leff, Krock allied himself with conservative elements in the U.S. State Department who erected bureaucratic obstacles to Jewish immigration and tried to suppress information about the Holocaust.

In short, the Times, the newspaper of record that prides itself on its professionalism, did not acquit itself brilliantly during that dark era.

Leff writes: "Compared with other events, the Times... did not consider the extermination of the Jews to be terribly important."

Need more be said.

Memorial garden opens

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After almost 10 years in the planning, Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park (THMP) has officially opened the Memorial Garden at Pardes Shalom Cemetery in Richmond Hill.

The garden, located at the east end of the cemetery, has been specially designed to give visitors a place to remember and mourn loved ones who are buried elsewhere or have no known burial site.

Speaking at the opening ceremonies on Oct. 16, Martin Belman, a member of the THMP board, said the idea for the garden came about in the spring of 1996 when the board was approached by a family whose young son had disappeared while travelling in the Himalayas.

The family suggested the creation of a memorial for "missing persons" and proposed a design, but the project was eventually put on hold.

In 2000, however, board members were convinced that there was a need in the community for such a memorial. They ultimately hired Hilton Landmarks, a cemetery planning and design firm, which developed the architectural and landscape plan for the garden, and final designs were modified by THMP to suit a Jewish site.

In the middle of the garden are black 14-by-20 foot granite monoliths made by the Quebec firm Polycor Granite Bussiere Architectural Stone.

Robert Hilton, representing his firm, said a unique feature of one of the sculptures is a glass Star of David, which was made by Custom Door Hardware Manufacturing out of material supplied by Classics Glass Company.

The translucent star, placed atop and within the granite monument, allows natural light to transform the colour of the glass symbol as it passes through, he said.

"The star conveys the dynamic, always changing lives of those remembered and those remembering... as the glass changes colour when seen from different viewpoints or as the angle of light passing through it changes from sunrise to sunset."

The concrete pedestrian path, or memorial walk, accommodates barrier-free access for all visitors, he said, while benches "offer visitors a chance to sit, reflect, remember or simply enjoy the comfort and sanctuary provided by this special place."

Associated to hold reunion

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Mayeer Pearl, a Toronto accountant, plans to go back to school on Nov. 20, and he figures a couple of thousand people may join him.

The 1988 graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools (AHS) is co-chair, with Aurelia Ostro, of what is expected to be the school's largest ever reunion. The Sunday evening event will be held at the school's Kamin Education Centre in Thornhill.

"It's going to be an exciting night," said Pearl, who is also a member of the school's board, following in the footsteps of his late grandfather Harold Dessen, who was president and chair of the board from 1979 to 1985.

Pearl said the reunion will feature entertainment, speakers, and "a lot of memorabilia. His memories of his own school days include "a lot of fun, and good friends." Academically, he said, the school served as "a good start to getting through life," and Judaically, it also provided "a groundwork for living your life."

AHS was founded in 1907, and its Brunswick Avenue campus in downtown Toronto opened in 1925. As the Jewish community migrated northward, so did Associated, which opened a school on Neptune Avenue in 1957. The school currently has classes from nursery to Grade 5 on Neptune, in a new building that replaced the original one in 1998, and at the Thornhill site, which was built in 1995. The middle school is located in the Bathurst Street and Finch Avenue area.

An alumni database has 6,000 names, dating back to the early 1950s, said Pearl. Of those, the school has addresses for 4,000 people. Most have remained in Toronto, although there are "quite a few" in the United States and Israel, he said.

Tickets for the reunion are $18 before Oct. 31, $20 at the door. For more information, go to www.ahschools.com or e-mail alumni@ahschoools.com.

Israel trip reconnects troubled youth with heritage

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

For a group of troubled Jewish youth from Toronto, Israel has proven exactly what the doctor ordered.

It's been a little more than a year since the 11 young travellers returned from two weeks touring Israel on a groundbreaking program called "From Darkness to Light."

It was described as a first in the world: a group of toughened, streetwise Jews, aged 17 to 24, who haven't registered on the community's radar screen due to drug abuse, poverty, homelessness, foster care, rehabilitation, spotty school records, brushes with the law and problems with parents, were taken to Israel just like any other Jewish youth tour.

The idea was to remove them from the cycle of despair, at least for a while, and boost their self-esteem, but also to show them that perhaps their heritage counts for more than they had thought.

It was the first trip to Israel for many. For some, it was their first time away from Toronto and on a plane.

No one believed the trip would turn the participants into instant angels, but nearly all the participants are working to get their lives together. Organizers intend to turn it into a regular mission, provided they can secure the funding, and call it "Israel Beats the Streets."

Another measure of the trip's success is that nearly all the participants want to return to Israel – some for good.

In fact, three young women didn't even come home: One stayed in Israel with relatives, as she had planned, while one went to a one-year program on a kibbutz, and the third has found a full-time job.

Aliyah was one of the mission's central goals, says Lillian Freedman, a Toronto social worker who co-organized the project with the local Israel Aliyah Centre.

"A lot of these kids would never have visited Israel otherwise. And Israel can provide them with an infrastructure and a lot of opportunities," including free college-level courses and money for integration.

For Melissa Sananes, a bubbly 21-year-old who left home at a young age, the trip resulted in newfound feelings for Israel.

"I learned a new respect for my nation," she says. "I got to meet family I had never met before. I learned a lot about the land."

She isn't ready to admit that Israel changed her life, but she says it has helped give it structure, which she is using to study at Centennial College, with a view to a career in psychiatric nursing.

Aric Fishman, 19, who lives with his mother, says the trip "was completely positive. It was fun and educational – like jumping into cold water."

He and his fellow travellers formed a tight-knit group, and he says he got a lot out of being with 10 other people who have all faced difficulty in life.

Fishman is now finishing high school, and while he has no immediate plans, he's hoping to attend an Israeli university and serve in the Israeli army. Ultimately, he's shooting for a career as a wilderness tour guide, possibly in Israel.

"They didn't throw religion at us," remarks Karen, a serious 21-year-old who works in the funeral business (and didn't want her last name used). "They taught us a whole lot without us even knowing it... I didn't expect the trip to be as good as it was."

Karen is also grateful. "I don't think any of us would have gotten the chance otherwise to visit to Israel," she says. Karen had wanted to go before, but was twice rejected from Taglit-birthright israel, the highly successful program that has taken thousands of young people on a free 10-day trip to the country.

For Gil, an intense 20-year-old Israeli citizen who lived in the country for seven years before coming to Canada as a child, the trip provided coping and inter-personal skills.

"It taught me to get along with people I might not have gotten along with," he says. "I saw long-lost family, and it also brought me closer to my religion."

Gil is busy paying off his debts and wants to get into a technical career, possibly tool-and-die making.

Freedman is now aiming for an ongoing program.

"The results have been nothing short of miraculous, and I'm really proud of the kids," she says. "They came such a long way on just a little. What they got was absolute unconditional acceptance. It connected them in such a wonderful way."

A self-described freelance social worker, Freedman has turned Jewish homelessness into a personal crusade. Over the past six years, she has helped locate and house several dozen homeless and transient Jews in Toronto. Many were under 25.

Two years ago, she hooked up with Gadi Anavi, the former shaliach at the Israel Aliyah Centre for Toronto and Western Canada, who had been wondering how he could get to kids who weren't qualifying for birthright israel.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto kicked in a last-minute grant of $30,000 for last August's trip.

But just last week, Freedman was turned down for a grant from the New York-based Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies, to which she had applied for a portion of the funds allocated to the birthright program.

The organization said "this is not a project we are prepared to fund at this time," but it encouraged her to "keep working through local channels. As you know, local issues often resonate with local funders."

Perhaps the most telling description of the program comes from a short documentary in the works about the trip.

Says one scruffy young man with eyes that have seen enough to last a lifetime: "Just coming here makes me feel that I actually belong to something, as opposed to wandering around doing whatever the hell I want, having fun and partying and doing drugs and gang banging, the violence and the rest of it.

"[Israel] is such a change, and such a culture shock. I love this place."

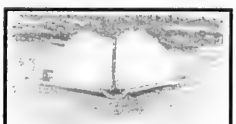
In the aftermath of Yom Kippur

By RABBI DAVID CADOCH



The awesome Day of Atonement has refreshed us with a clean slate and a sense of lightness. As we repeat throughout the Yom Kippur service: "For on this day HaShem provides atonement for you to cleanse you; from all your transgressions before the Eternal you shall be cleansed." (Leviticus, 16:30).

Following the Yom Kippur evening service, I returned to my family and my wife made an interesting remark. She marvelled at the profound significance of such a privilege to be cleansed once a year of the heavy burden of human error before the Almighty.

Reflecting on her remark, I realized its implications.

This kindness that the Eternal has bestowed on Klal Israel is a tremendous source of spiritual, psychological and emotional healing. It removes the burden of guilt that has accumulated throughout the year and completely purges the negativity of our erroneous choices.

Our sages note that the verse distinctly mentions "from all your transgressions before the Eternal shall you be cleansed." But what about the wrong we do to our fellow human beings, and in human beings I include non-Jewish people. (It is a profound misconception to believe that we can hurt or deceive non-Jews.) Torah Law has provided the means to rectify the damage we do to others. We are obligated to reasonably search out those we have wronged and seek their forgiveness. If they refuse to forgive us, the matter lies in HaShem's court.

What has this powerful day, Yom Kippur, bestowed upon us? The ability to go about another year with the peace of mind and confidence that HaShem has blessed each of us with a fresh start.

The sages of the Talmud (Yoma 20a) tell us: "The yetzer hara [evil impulse] has no permission to act as an accuser on the Day of Atonement. According to the sage Rami bar Chama, the gematria [numerical value] of HaSatan [the impediment] is 364, which accounts for the days in the year that the yetzer hara distracts us. However, on the day of Atonement, the yetzer has no such power. On this day we fast and pray with the opportunity to elevate ourselves to a deep spiritual level."

We are to understand the meaning of Atonement – or "At-one-ment" – as an ongoing process of being at one with one's true personality. It has the same connotation as tfillah. Prayer in Hebrew is tfillah, and the verb to pray in the reflexive form is hitpallel. In other words, the act of praying is an act of self-evaluation.

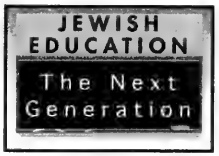
As Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsh wrote: "Tfillah is a step out of active life in order to attempt to gain a true judgment of oneself, that is, about one's ego, about one's relationship to God and the world, and of God and the world to oneself. It strives to infuse mind and heart with the power of such judgment as will direct both anew to active life – purified, sublimated, and strengthened."

The idea of tshuvah (return/repentance) as a form of resolve to better oneself is only possible once we feel remorse for the wrong we've committed. The Hebrew word for remorse is charatah, which translates literally as "incision" or "cut". When a person feels the hurt done to another as a personal wound, then it's possible to resolve to never act in this manner again. When this kind of resolve comes from a love for humanity and the sanctity of life, transgressions transform into merits, for to love humanity is to love the Almighty.

Rabbi David Cadoch is a chaver of HaGaon HaRav Leib Baron's Beth Din of Montreal and a member of the Rabbinical Council of Canada and the Rabbinical Council of America.

The challenges facing baalei tshuvah

By ELLIOTT MALAMET



One of the most significant trends in Jewish education over the last several decades has been the ba'al tshuvah movement, in which previously secular Jews embrace a life of religious observance.

The catalysts to such change are by now well known, from the outreach efforts of Chabad (a direct result of the imperative set out by the late Lubavitcher Rebbe) to the work of Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, and to institutions popularly associated with this movement such as Aish HaTorah and Ohr Somayach.

The different manifestations of the phenomenon range from the post-Six Day War return to religion to the fallout from the liberal 1960s, when individuals attracted to spiritual ideas and ideals converted this energy to a Torah way of life.

There is a unique importance in the decision of certain Jews, in an era of rampant intermarriage and assimilation, to rediscover their heritage and commit to the path of mitzvot. Baalei tshuvah thus buck the overwhelming inclination of much of present-day Jewry to shun a religious worldview. But such a radical shift in life path, even if it leads to an uplifting transformation and structured daily regimen, does not necessarily eliminate a host of difficulties that require serious examination.

The challenges to baalei tshuvah upon becoming observant may include everything from their relationship with the "frum from birth" community to interactions with their own parents and extended families. Indeed, for the baal tshuvah, a family celebration is not necessarily an innocent matter, as it conjures up potential kashrut and Shabbat violations as part of the mix.

A host of other questions also arise: Do baalei tshuvah tend to remain overly or exclusively attached to the institutions that may have nurtured their initial interest in Judaism and subsequent growth? Does this attachment hinder their religious growth in any way? From a psychological perspective, how do baalei tshuvah contend with the different parts of their experience (their life before versus their life after, so to speak).

But perhaps the most challenging issue, from an educational point of view, pertains to the children of baalei tshuvah. Recently, Rabbi Yaacov Haber, the former national director of Jewish education for the Orthodox Union, wrote that the challenge of being a member of the second generation can lead to grave problems. Some even end up rejecting the very lifestyle their parents struggled so hard to attain, often with a disdainful retort such as, "You rejected your upbringing, now it's my turn." Often the ba'al tshuvah remains quite alone to handle these dilemmas, caught between their Orthodox co-religionists and their secular relatives who, respectively, either can't relate to the problem or may not see it as a problem at all.

On Saturday, Nov. 5, at 8 p.m., at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue in Toronto, I will be joined by three fellow baalei tshuvah – Dr. Lisa Aiken, Prof. Eric Lawee and Rabbi Michael Skobac – as we probe the above-mentioned issues and others. This will open Torah in Motion's fourth annual "Renewing Our Spirit" conference, and for all those interested in the religious quest in the modern world, we hope you can join us.

Jewish Life

Why we still need religion

Books
Bernard Baskin

The crimes of organized religion throughout history beggar the imagination. At the same time, however, there is religion's benign and positive side. I am sure that we still need religion for the following reasons.

• In order to grapple with the riddle of the cosmos and our relationship to it: We live in "universal time" in which we are granted a "brief moment." What is our role and goal in life? What is our relationship to the earth, the sea, the sky? Seeking answers to "eternal mysteries" is among the chief and unending functions of religion, whether we be underling or master, peasant or philosopher.

• Because we must rely upon poetry in our attempt to express the inexpressible: Why does the 23rd Psalm retain its fascination for even the allegedly "irreligious?" Why does the Bible as a whole retain its paramount place in world literature? Does not this ancient magnificent library still furnish ethical wisdom as valid today as in the days its scrolls were first inscribed?

• Because we cannot believe that the universe is a mechanism, and mortal men and women merely automations: Mathematics, astronomy, physics and other domains of knowledge are unable to adequately explain the universe. No matter how far our spaceships and rockets penetrate, the heavens still remain limitless.

The human race has always battled with its own creativity. Technological inventions have been blessings, but they have also created mechanisms of destruction and annihilation. Without a belief in something deeper than the material workings of the world, humanity's fragile grip on goodness easily slips. All the blessings of our age will be vain if we permit science to strip us of soul. Human skill creates marvels; still, we cannot let the products of our hands divert us from the prompting of our hearts.

Science involves looking outward. The scientist must be separate from the object studied in order to gain intellectual mastery over it. Sanctity asks us to look within as well as without and to judge not by a scale of mastery but by a scale of reverence. For all its power, science cannot be the meaning of our lives or tell us why to get up in the morning. Supreme at "how" questions, science does not answer "why." That is the function of faith.

• In order to preserve the continuity of the heritage into which we are born, or which we accept by conviction: If we cultivate the Hellenic and Roman legacy, we should also adhere to the overarching Hebraic inheritance, which has contributed so many of the teachings and practices that form the cornerstone of the world's culture. Religion can stabilize the personality of our children and young people; it can enrich and uphold the solidarity of family life in an epoch that is reeling from the upheaval of a social earthquake. Why should we lightly or ignorantly discard values that have helped to harness savage human impulses?

• As a way of testifying to the sacredness of human life: Religion at its best and highest insists that all of us incarnate something of the divine. Such a conviction, the sacredness and inviolability of every individual, may seem naive but it is the hope of the world.

Rather than be hostile or alienated by the dark side of religion, thinking men and women should cling to its affirmative and life-giving precepts, for they enable us, in a time of malaise and uncertainty, to walk humbly and act mercifully.

The Jewish way with words

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Jews, of course, are called the People of the Book. Every November, we celebrate those Jewish books and the inspiration and creativity that go into creating them. But at times, a Jew doesn't need an entire book to get a point across. Sometimes all it takes is one razor-sharp line.

Today, where to find the best quotes by Jews on the web.

Let's start at the beginning – or should that be "In the Beginning?" The Torah, Mishnah, Talmud and their commentaries are full of words to the wise, as relevant today as ever.

The Jewish Education Network has brought together hundreds of them and organized them in a very long list – 71 pages when I printed it all out. A sampling:

• Anger kills the foolish man. – Job 5:2

• A needle's eye is not too narrow for two lovers, but the whole world is not wide enough for two enemies. – Ibn Gabirol, Mibhar HaPeninim, c.1050, #281

• Do not take drugs because they will become habitual, your heart will request them and you will also waste money. Even as medicine, don't use drugs if another medicine is possible. – Rabbi Samuel ben Meir (12th century commentator) explaining Pesahim 113a [http://tinyurl.com/dhe7b]

The largest trove of quotes that I came across is also the easiest to use. The Jewish Wisdom Database has culled more than 3,100 sayings from quite an interesting crowd. Where else could you read about the musings of Woody Allen ("Life is full of misery, loneliness and suffering – and it's all over much too soon") next to those of the Chofetz Chaim ("It is no challenge to die like a Jew; the true challenge is to live like a Jew.") Jacob Richman has done an amazing job organizing this eclectic mix. You can search by topic (animals, anti-Semitism, books, etc.) or by keyword. And you can choose to browse only the humourous proverbs if you like. Such as:

· If you want to give God a good laugh, tell Him your plans. – Yiddish proverb

· Ninety per cent of the politicians give the other 10 per cent a bad reputation. – Henry A. Kissinger

· I want my children to have all the things I couldn't afford. Then I want to move in with them. – Phyllis Diller [www.j.co.il/proverbs/proverbs_search.asp]

If you like your quotes to appear automatically – and if you can understand Hebrew – then you can download and install the Psuko program. Every time you turn on your computer, you will be greeted by a different piece of Jewish wisdom. The program is completely free and there are no pesky ads to irritate you. [http://psuko.web-site.co.il/us_main.shtml] (Note: this is a Windows-only application that ran properly when I installed it using Windows 2000. The documentation says it will work in any Windows environment – 95, 98 ME, XP, etc – but I have not tested it.)

And if you'd like to keep things simple, then just go to the Random Talmud Server, "a chance-guided service for those who love the sea of Talmud." Every time you click on the link below, you'll be served up a different piece of wisdom such as:

· A dream which is not interpreted is like a letter which is not read.– Berachot 55a

· R. Hanina said: I have learnt much from my teachers, and from my colleagues, more than from my teachers, but from my disciples, more than from them all. - Taanith 7a [http://web.wt.net/~cbenton/randtal.htm]

Social worker's career spanned 35 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Two events stand out in Avraham Friedman's mind after a career in social work that has spanned almost 35 years.

The first involved being confronted by a man with a gun wanting to kill himself who later became a client, and the second occurred when he was on sabbatical in Israel and his young son, who has special needs, took a public bus on his own and got lost.

Recently retired from Jewish Family & Child Service, where he has worked since 1973, Friedman, 60, a Toronto native, says these events – both turned out positively – did not discourage him from pursuing a career that has been both challenging and rewarding.

His association with the agency goes back to 1970, he says, when he worked for Children's Aid Society.

"Until 1981, when JF&CS obtained its status as a children's aid society, it went through CAS to have children removed from their home. Then [former JF&CS executive director Jerome Diamond] interviewed me because he had dreams of the agency becoming a CAS, and he wanted my knowledge.

"I didn't [have intentions] of staying so long, but as an Orthodox Jew working in a Jewish agency, it felt like home, and the agency is so broad I was never without a challenge."

Over the years, he has among other things, supervised a group of clinical social workers, supervised the intake department, supervised the financial assistance program, done group work and family life education, and supervised the family support program for parents caring at home for children with developmental disabilities.

When he retired, he was supervisor of the agency's foster care program, which handles anywhere from 80 to 100 children in care at any one time. He also supervised workers who sought places for children who needed homes beyond what foster families could provide.

Avraham Friedman

One of his most meaningful experiences, he says, was working with the children in foster care. So meaningful, in fact, that in the early 1970's he and his wife first took in a foster child, a non-Jewish teenage girl.

"[When she was still living at our home, I saw Miracle Mart's mashgiach at shul] and he told me about a non-Jewish girl who knew all about kashruth. He didn't know that it was my foster daughter."

His family – Friedman and his wife Bernice, have five birth children and one adopted child – still keep in touch with the girl who now has two adult children of her own, he says.

Over the years, they have taken 10 foster children into their home, he says, as well as the now 25-year-old adopted son, who has special needs.

"I first saw [my adopted son] in the hospital just after he was born. He was wearing Santa Claus pajamas, and all the nurses were fighting over him. He [initially] came home with us as a foster child."

Another child stayed for nine years, he says, and the family still keeps in contact with him, as well.

"He left our home because of emotional difficulties. His behaviour was beyond what we could manage, and we had to place him in a treatment home. He is now 25 years old, and living in Israel. He was in the army, he is now working in sales, and we have met his girlfriend. That is our naches."

As both a social worker and a foster parent, he understands the important role each plays, he says.

"I had one child under my supervision for 12 years, and I feel as if I brought him up. I tell the social workers that they are the workers/parents of 23 to 25 kids. They have to be involved in every aspect of the kids' lives.

"We feel the importance of our work when we [witness] the outcome. Some kids turn out wonderfully."

In professional work they speak of boundaries, he says, "but in the Jewish community it is a challenge to maintain boundaries. We always run into clients.

"As a foster parent, and as the parent of a special needs child, I have learned that boundaries need not be so rigid. The challenge is to integrate one's life experiences, and I have had the opportunity of doing a lot of integration."

A sadness has permeated his life, he says, with the recent death of his young granddaughter. "I was there as a grandparent and as a parent to my child. It was a very difficult loss."

Friedman is remaining at the agency half-time to do some contract work, he says, and he plans to spend a good deal of time with his wife, his children and his grandchildren, as well as extended time in Israel.

There's no point trying to read Sharon's mind

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Following Israel's withdrawal from Gaza and parts of the northern West Bank, few Middle East analysts – including those who have been highly critical of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in the past – would dare, in the absence of hard evidence, to predict what's on Sharon's mind.

But in an Oct. 7 Globe and Mail opinion piece, "The new, improved Sharon: different face, same goal," Michael Bell wrote that Sharon's "objective" is to impose a unilateral solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict "that would allow his country to annex upwards of 40 per cent of the West Bank."

As a former Canadian ambassador to Israel who is widely respected for his knowledge of the Middle East, Bell might be expected to provide careful analysis based on verifiable source material. Instead, he referred only to unspecified and "albeit speculative" maps "pieced together from privately and publicly available sources." That vagueness hardly amounts to substantial evidence.

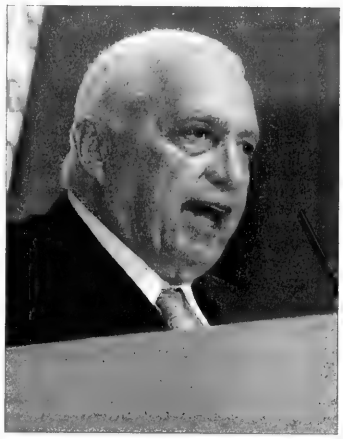
Bell added a strong dose of inconsistency to his largely unsupported opinion. He wrote that Israel's security barrier (still under construction) "will largely define" Israel's future border on the east and incorporate "[s]ome 80 per cent of Israeli settlers."

Yet, after two major Israeli Supreme Court rulings that Israel move parts of the fence closer to the Green Line in order to minimize Palestinian hardship, only about seven per cent of the West Bank will be affected by the fence. Assuming that Israeli sovereignty incorporates this seven per cent, where does Bell think Sharon will find the remaining 33 per cent of the West Bank to "annex"?

In a column for the Israeli daily Ha'aretz ("PM syndrome," Oct. 7), diplomatic editor Aluf Benn also questioned where Sharon is headed. But Benn did not pretend to read Sharon's mind, although he admitted that there is no end to the speculation on this subject.

Benn reminded readers that Sharon has officially recommitted himself to the internationally sanctioned "road map" peace plan. The plan first demands an end to Palestinian violence and the dismantling of the terrorist infrastructure, an end to Israeli settlement growth, and, following other stages, the establishment of a Palestinian state.

Benn wrote: "In Sharon's worldview, the American commitment to the road map is Israel's best defence. Behind the Americans are the Europeans, who support the Palestinians and are now forced to grit their teeth in the face of the security condition that promises no political movement without the liquidation of terrorism. And until that happens, no demands can be made of Israel... The ball, at least for the time being, is in the Palestinian court."



Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon

Bell did not even refer to the road map. Instead, he focused solely on Sharon, expecting pretty much the worst. Benn, however, reminded us that the international community has established a sequence of moves that obligates both the Palestinians and Israelis.

In the wake of Israel's unilateral withdrawal, a suprisingly large number of Mideast analysts placed the onus on the Palestinian Authority under President Mahmoud Abbas to establish order and good governance by, among other things, reining in the violence and disarming the terrorist organizations such as Hamas. As even the Beirut Daily Star wrote in its Oct. 4 editorial ("Anarchy in Gaza"), "If the PA cannot provide law and order for its own citizens, any talk of a peace agreement with the Israelis is irrelevant."

Beth Tzedec's new rabbi sees 'limitless' opportunities

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Sean Gorman made a point of wearing a tie for an interview with The CJN, although as a rule he doesn't when he is in his office. He says, however, that his style as a rabbi is informal.

His daughter's sippy cup on his desk attests to the fact his office is child-friendly. The father of three children, aged 8, 5 and 3, recently became the third rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation, replacing Rabbi Aubrey Glazer, who has taken a position in Westchester, N.Y.

Beth Tzedec also recently hired a new cantor, Simon Spiro. The synagogue's former cantor, Meir Finkelstein, is now at a synagogue in West Bloomfield, Mich.

Rabbi Gorman, a 36-year-old native of Brooklyn who attended junior high and high school in Norfolk, Va., was ordained in 1998 from the Jewish Theological Seminary, the New York training ground for clergy in the Conservative movement. Before that, he completed an undergraduate degree in psychology at the State University of New York in Buffalo.

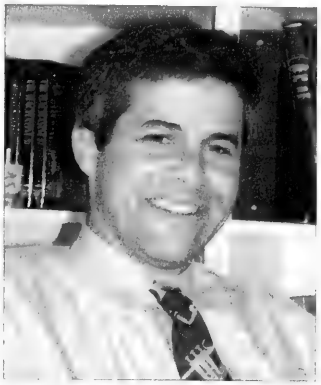
Most recently, he served as spiritual leader of the Bellmore Jewish Centre on Long Island, N.Y., a synagogue with some 200 member families – less than one-tenth the size of Beth Tzedec.

Immediately after ordination, Rabbi Gorman was a U.S. Navy chaplain in Pearl Harbor, Hawaii. He then spent 18 months with the U.S. Marine Corps in North Carolina.

He enjoyed life in Hawaii, he said, although it "had its challenges." Obtaining kosher meat was difficult, but his in-laws would bring it whenever they visited, he said.

Rabbi Gorman's father also served in the navy. His mother was an anti-war marcher. The rabbi has a framed T-shirt of hers, older than he is, hanging in his office. It bears the familiar Vietnam War-era slogan, "War is not healthy for children and other living things."

Beth Tzedec's size, its location in a large, Jewishly diverse community and its "commitment to tradition" was part of the appeal for the rabbi, who was raised in the Reform movement but found that it became "too liberal" for him. "I doubt [the number of opportunities here] is limitless, because nothing is, but it seems limitless."



Rabbi Sean Gorman

In terms of tradition and synagogue ritual, Beth Tzedec is similar to his last congregation, offering Torah honours such as aliyot to women, but not counting them in the minyan.

At Beth Tzedec, Rabbi Gorman will continue Rabbi Glazer's work with the synagogue's Generation Hutzpah group for people in their 20s and early 30s. He is also planning to start several chavurot, in addition to fulfilling "more traditional" roles such as teaching and officiating at life-cycle events.

His wife, Rabbi Jennifer Gorman (see related story on page 21), teaches part time at United Synagogue Day School and is working as a family educator with Beth Tzedec's Institute for Jewish Family Living, a pilot project under the direction of Elly Bauman.

New guide to Israeli wines released

Simultaneous Israeli wine-tasting parties were held worldwide to celebrate last month's release of Toby Press' Rogov's Guide to Israeli Wines 2006.

Wine tasters in New York City, Washington, D.C., London, Tel Aviv and Jerusalem gathered to taste wine and view the second annual edition of the guide.

Written by Israeli wine critic Daniel Rogov, the wine and restaurant critic for the daily newspaper Ha'aretz, the pocket-sized 400-page guide indicates which of Israel's wines are kosher, provides information on what makes a wine kosher, and features a section on whether there is a contradiction between good wine and kosher wine.

In addition to listing the names and contact details of more than 140 wineries – about 20 more than last year – and 1,200 wines through to the 2004 vintage, which were tasted, rated and fully described, the 2006 guide also has detailed maps of Israel's wine regions.

Wineries in the reader-friendly book are arranged in alphabetical order, and following a brief description, wines are reviewed from the top-level series to the lower level.

Each series is divided into red, white, sparkling and dessert wines, and then further divided into grape varieties such as Cabernet Sauvignon or Merlot.

Reviews conclude with scores and drinking windows, the suggested period during which wines are at their very best.

A highlight of the premier edition, also available in the new book, is a reader's guide to wine tasting. Rogov talks about peak times for tasting – the morning before one has developed true hunger – and ideal room conditions – well lit and odour-free.

He also suggests tasting white wines before red, and within the same group, start with light wines before full-bodied wines.

The other Rabbi Gorman breaks new ground

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Jennifer Gorman is something of a novelty in Toronto, as the first female rabbi to be affiliated with a Conservative synagogue.

Her husband, Rabbi Sean Gorman, joined the clergy at Beth Tzedec Congregation in August as third rabbi, and she was recently hired as a family educator at the synagogue's Institute for Jewish Family Living, under whose auspices she runs monthly Shabbat morning services, Jewish holiday programs, family education programs for bar and bat mitzvah kids, and services for the High Holy Days for young families.

The mother of three children, ranging in age from 3 to 8, is also a part-time Jewish studies teacher at United Synagogue Day School's Bayview Avenue campus.

On one occasion, someone assumed she was a substitute teacher, not "Rabbi Gorman." But the person quickly apologized and noted that she'd made a sexist assumption, Rabbi Gorman said.

"People have said, 'This is something we're not used to, but we're very happy to have you,'" she said.

Although Rabbi Gorman's personal philosophy is more liberal, she said she is "comfortable" with Beth Tzedec's position on women's ritual involvement, which permits women to have Torah honours but not to count in the minyan. "I believe it to be a valid halachic opinion that women are not traditionally obligated in tfillot. In order to lead the davening, you need to have some obligation."

The Conservative movement accepts that differing rabbinic opinions can each be halachically valid. Historically, there are centuries of Jewish precedent for that diversity, she noted.

Generally speaking, the rabbi sees no reason why women shouldn't be counted in a minyan. "As a rabbi, I would love to see that, but I know that each community has to decide for itself if it's ready."

Rabbi Gorman grew up at a traditional Conservative synagogue on Long Island, where she was the first girl to have a Saturday morning bat mitzvah. But it wasn't until three years ago, at age 34, that she had her first aliyah to the Torah there.

"Things tend to change slowly. There was progress, but it's not only about whether something is halachically acceptable. It has to be communally acceptable also."

A 1996 ordinee of the Jewish Theological Seminary, Rabbi Gorman decided to become a rabbi after someone suggested it to her when she was an undergraduate sociology student at Brandeis University.

"It was like a lightning bulb went off... It had never occurred to me [to become a rabbi], never having had a woman role model."

Rabbi Jennifer Gorman

USDS' Bayview campus will remain open

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Parents with children enrolled at United Synagogue Day School's Bayview campus can breathe a bit easier these days.

After announcing last June that USDS' three campuses would be merged into two because of a drop in enrolment and that its Bayview campus, located at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, could ultimately close, the school's board of directors eliminated the latter possibility at a meeting last month.

"This is very crucial for people to understand that the school is staying open. There is nothing on the table [for the Bayview campus] except that we are staying open no matter what," said Shawna Granovsky, one of five parents on the steering committee of Project Renaissance, a group formed to come up with ideas to keep the board from closing the campus.

USDS has about 890 students this fall, down from about 1,000 last September and 1,100 two years ago.

Last June, the board reacted to the decrease by announcing that the Richmond Hill campus, on Bayview Avenue north of Weldrick Road, and the Bayview campus, at Beth Tikvah south of Finch Avenue, will merge and be housed at Beth Tikvah for the 2006-07 school year.

USDS board president Allen Gales told concerned parents that USDS will try to sell the Richmond Hill campus, while the Bathurst campus, located at Beth Tzedec Congregation south of Eglinton Avenue, will undergo an $18-million renovation to add more classrooms, a gym and underground parking.

The school's new northern branch will open on the site of UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) development at Bathurst and Weldrick in time for the 2008-09 school year.

At that time, students from Bayview were to be moved to the Vaughan campus, which would have left the board with the option of either "redefining" or closing Bayview.

Barbara Palter, another Project Renaissance parent, said that rather than panic and pull their children out of the school in anger, as some parents did, committee members, determined not to let the board close the Bayview campus without a fight, began conducting surveys, demographic reviews and financial analyses to come up with "some new initiatives for the school to draw more children to Jewish day schools."

The changes the committee recommended for Bayview that were approved by the board include an extended day nursery program and an English-language Jewish studies program that starts in Grade 4. The new programs are meant to address the lull in enrolment in USDS' preschool, as well as improve the retention rate of students and the overall contentment of parents.

"We were trying to figure out how we could bring in increased enrolment at the younger years, because we have very good numbers at the top end of the school, even grades 2 through 8," Palter said.

"In most [Jewish] day schools there is a drop-off in Grade 3, because that is when the Jewish studies begins to become a bit too difficult."

To counter that trend, Palter said, the Project Renaissance parents came up with a model for students to learn Jewish studies in English.

"The mandate of this school is that any student who can learn Hebrew should have an opportunity to do so. But if a child cannot, it is still extremely important to provide them with a Jewish education. And if it is in English, then it shouldn't really matter," Palter said.

Gales said it's too soon to tell how the new initiatives will affect enrolment, since they won't be implemented until the 2006-07 school year, but he is optimistic.

"We anticipate that the response to the new programs will be very positive, given Project Renaissance's market research," he said.

Regardless of the success or failure of their committee's initiatives, both Palter and Granovsky promised that because of the board's Sept. 21 decision, the Bayview campus will stay open for years to come.

"We're not just looking ahead to the next three years. We're looking to the next five and 10 years and working very closely with the administration and board and looking into even more exciting things," Granovsky said.

Both Palter and Granovsky, who each have three children enrolled at USDS, wanted to stress that the Bayview campus is alive and kicking.

"Unfortunately, the word 'closed' rings in people's ears more than 'redefinition,' even though they were weighted as heavily [as options]. It was redefinition or close, and people only heard close," Palter said.

Now that the option to close the school has been officially rescinded, the board is trying to lure back parents who pulled their children out of the school.

"We are currently communicating with parents who left USDS to advise them of our Bayview decision and inviting them to re-enrol," Gales said.

Palter and Granovsky agreed that what makes the Bayview campus the best fit for them and their children is the location, the parent body, the mix of students and the teachers.

"Our school is incredible," Palter said. "We have almost 400 children [enrolled at Bayview]. The perception perhaps to the public was that we were a dying school with three kids in each class. It is unfortunate because we have a very vibrant school."

Teacher uses acting background to enhance lessons

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Mike Levinsky had no thoughts of becoming a teacher when a friend suggested in 1994 that he join him in applying to the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

Levinsky had just spent four years in Los Angeles acting in television pilots and commercials, and he had moved to Toronto with the intention of establishing an acting career here.

If things didn't work out, his friend suggested, teaching would provide a fallback. And the course was only a year.

Levinsky – now 37 and a teacher at Leo Baeck Day School for nine years – found that he loves teaching. But the father of three, who is married to an obstetrician, also still loves acting, and he uses it as a teaching tool.

He has given workshops to other teachers on incorporating drama into language arts, and on incorporating basic acting techniques into teaching, and he has also taught classroom management at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education's Midrasha L'Morim.

Recently, Levinsky spent part of a Grade 6 English class reading to students from the novel Silverwing. Adopting an Irish dialect and thundering tone for one of the characters, and using a broom handle as a prop, he immediately captured the children's attention.

One of Levinsky's aims is to foster a love of literature. When his students read silently, he wants them to "see it all happening in their heads."

A lesson from the teacher: "Encourage children to use their imaginations. With this fast-paced life we're living, we forget to go back to the roots of what it was all about: creativity, ingenuity and imagination."

It was his initiative to introduce Shakespeare to Grade 6 students at Leo Baeck (previously it was only on the Grade 8 curriculum), and he brims with enthusiasm for it.

"Shakespeare has some of the best stories in the world!" he said in an interview. "Kids understand it as well as anybody, once they get used to the language."

Levinsky also introduced a weekly drama program to the school, and last year he organized a sellout student production of Les Misérables. This year he is following up with Joseph and the Amazing Technicolour Dreamcoat.

Levinsky often gives students in his class an opportunity to act out vignettes related to their lessons, and to "write in role" (write in the first person, taking on the role of a literary character).

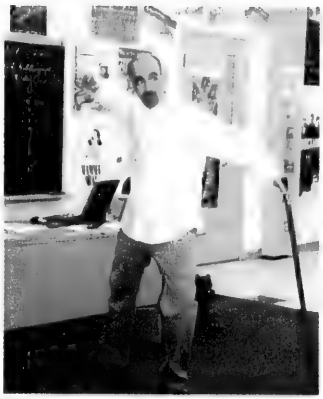
It makes students think, he said. "It deepens all understanding of literature when they have a chance to experience it instead of just read."

A graduate of the University of Arizona, where he received a bachelor of fine arts with a major in drama production, Levinsky grew up more interested in sports than drama.

The Toronto native, who moved to Arizona as a small child, was on the junior Maccabiah basketball team in 1985, and there is a strong sports history in his family. His father played college basketball, and his grandfather, Alex Levinsky, was the first Jewish hockey player in the NHL, playing on Stanley Cup-winning teams for the Toronto Maple Leafs and Chicago Black Hawks in the 1930s.

But despite his own love of sports, Levinsky says he's also always been "a bit of a ham."

Outside of Leo Baeck, he has a longtime association with local summer camps. His childhood summers were spent at Camp White Pine, and he served as its program director for 13 years. For the past three summers, he has held the same position at Camp Manitou.



Mike Levinsky hams it up for students at Leo Baeck. [Frances Kraft photo]

A member of ACTRA (the Alliance of Canadian Cinema, Television and Radio Artists) and the Screen Actors Guild, Levinsky finds his schedule leaves minimal time for professional gigs, although he has directed three productions of LifeBeat, an annual revue staged by health care professionals at Harbourfront's Premiere Dance Theatre.

In some ways, however, teaching is like "being on stage all the time… You've got to be on."

Israel leads the way in seeking new fuel

By LARA GREENBERG
Special to The CJN

Many of today's scientists are trying to find an alternative, pollution-free fuel for the future and this research has been a priority for the staff at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, Israel.

Hydrogen is seen as the most plentiful element in the universe and as such, is an attractive candidate for becoming this fuel of the future.

"After various experiments surrounding solar energy, the scientists realized that they needed to find a new kind of energy" said Michael Meyer, the national executive vice-president of Weizmann Canada. "We have solar and wind energy, now it's time for hydrogen."

However, nearly all hydrogen used today is produced by means of expensive processes that require the combustion of polluting fossil fuels. In addition, it is extremely difficult to store and transport hydrogen.

New solar technology developed by the Weizmann Institute, with the help of funding from Weizmann Canada, tackles these problems by creating an easily storable intermediate energy source made from metal ore such as zinc oxide.

With the help of concentrated sunlight, the ore is heated to about 1,200 C in a solar reactor, in the presence of wood charcoal. The process splits the ore, releasing oxygen and creating gaseous zinc, which is then condensed to a powder.

Zinc powder can later be reacted with water, yielding hydrogen to be used as fuel, and zinc oxide, which is recycled back to zinc in the solar plant. In recent experiments, the 300-kilowatt installation produced 45 kilograms of zinc powder from zinc oxide in one hour, exceeding projected goals.

The process generates no pollution, and the resultant zinc can be easily stored, transported and converted to hydrogen on demand.

In addition, the zinc can be used directly, for example, in zinc-air batteries, which serve as efficient converters of chemical to electrical energy.

Thus, the method offers a way of storing solar energy in chemical form and releasing it as needed.

"The success of our recent experiments brings the approach closer to industrial use," according to engineer Michael Epstein, project leader at the Weizmann Institute.

Results of the experiments were reported by Epstein and Weizmann scientist Jacob Karni in early August at the 2005 Solar World Congress of the International Solar Energy Society in Orlando, Fla.

The concept of splitting metal ores with the help of sunlight has been under development for several years at the Weizmann Institute's Canadian Institute for the Energies and Applied Research in Israel, one of the most sophisticated solar research facilities in the world, which has a solar tower, a field of 64 mirrors and unique beam-down optics.

Weizmann scientists are currently investigating metal ores other than zinc oxide, as well as additional materials that may be used for efficient conversion of sunlight into storable energy.

Concert planned to raise the roof at Ottawa shul

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A musical event with a twist will be held to raise funds for Congregation Agudath Israel.

Following a fire which damaged the synagogue's roof in August, Cantor Shneur Bielak came up with the idea for the concert, "Mediterranean Melodies: Sea the Music."

For the past two years Cantor Bielak, a tenor, has been studying with internationally renowned soprano Maria Pellegrini. During that time, they have become friends and have enjoyed sharing their music as well as their rich cultural heritages.

They decided to collaborate on a community-wide concert to share their music, including other musicians from the Mediterranean as well.

"There are similarities between cantorial music and opera," Cantor Bielak said. "In our friendship, Maria and I discovered that our cultures also share some commonalities. Our cultures value our heritages and we look forward to sharing our passion for music with the broader community.

"This will allow people to enjoy their passion for music – not just one genre."

On Nov. 13 at 7:30 p.m., the synagogue will host a musical evening featuring guest artists Israeli folksinger Naomi Brandt, guitarist Antonio Romandini, tenor Cantor Ben Silverberg, and Perry Carmen and the Carmen Romandini Orchestra from Montreal.

Pellegrini will sing arias from the operas Tosca, La Boheme, Madama Butterfly and Aida.

"For this evening, I gathered talented artists and other friends to join me in this performance to raise funds for the synagogue," Bielak said

The organizers hope members of the Italian community will attend the concert, he added. "We also hope that the event's success will lead to further such collaborations."

The concert is chaired by Josee Posen who said she is looking forward to bringing together two culturally rich heritages for a most enjoyable evening.

The event is under the joint patronage of the Embassy of Italy and the Embassy of Israel and both ambassadors plan to be at the concert.

"What happened [the fire] was a tragedy, but this event can strengthen us as a community," said Cantor Bielak.

Tickets are available only by advance sale. They can be purchased online at www.alleventsplanning.com or by calling the synagogue office at 613-728-3501.

Romania takes responsibility for role in Holocaust

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — After many years of tirelessly working to have his homeland of Romania recognize and take responsibility for its actions against its Jewish citizens during World War II, Issie Veisfeld achieved success.

Veisfeld, the president of the Association of Romanian Jewish Survivors of the Holocaust in Montreal, was in Ottawa recently with Montreal city councillor Dida Berku, the daughter of a Romanian Holocaust survivor, to meet with Romanian Ambassador Liviu Maoir. Also at the Romanian embassy were Eric Vernon of the Canadian Jewish Congress and Ofir Gendelman, second secretary at the Israeli Embassy.

On Oct. 9, Romania observed its second annual Holocaust Commemoration Day with President Traian Basescu making the following statement: "We are condemning not the Romanian people, but the Romanian government, who placed Romania among the countries that oppressed the Jews."

The International Commission of the Holocaust in Romania, chaired by author and human rights activist Elie Wiesel, presented its findings and recommendations to then-president Iliescu on November 11, 2004.

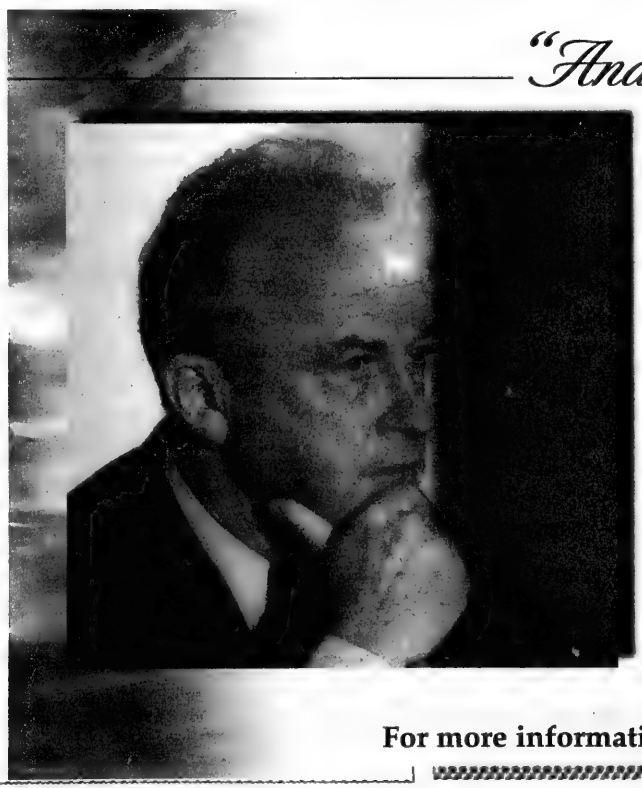
At the ceremony in Ottawa, Maoir gave credit to Veisfeld. "The idea of organizing such a gathering belongs to Mr. Issie Veisfeld," he said. "It is not an easy task to make Romanians [to] assume their full history."

Romania has come a long way in terms of human rights and democracy, he said. "We adopted legislation in the spirit of Europe and democratic states in regard to anti-defamation laws, but also we took serious steps in studying about the Holocaust. The school textbooks are changed now, the first step for the young generation to know what the Holocaust was. We are working with the Ministry of Education in Israel in preparing such textbooks and also with Yad Vashem."

Veisfeld stressed that the Jews of Romania had made great contributions to the country and that he wants them to be remembered for their efforts and not just as victims.

Maoir agreed, noting that Wiesel was born in Romania, as was the designer Tommy Hilfiger. "How many Canadians know that Edward G. Robinson was a Jew from Bucharest?" Maoir asked.

"Living with a dark past is not an easy life. Recognizing and making Romania a democratic country, a country which is ready for acceptance in the EU, we can be real members only if we recognize our responsibilities for the fate of thousands and thousands and thousands of human beings killed just because they were Jews," he said.



"And you did not know, Yitzchak, how much they loved you"

UTT firebomber's mother has case put off till spring

Delay due to sheer volume of wiretapping that was recorded

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The next court date in the case of the mother of the United Talmud Torahs firebomber has been set for May 15, 2006 – exactly two years after her arrest.

Rouba El-Merhebi Fahd, 37, pleaded not guilty last December to charges of being an accessory after the fact in her son Sleiman El-Merhebi's firebombing on April 5, 2004, of the library of the Jewish elementary school in St. Laurent. She has been free since her arraignment in May 2004 on $10,000 bail.

El-Merhebi, 19, who pleaded guilty to reduced charges, is serving a 40-month prison sentence handed down last January.

Fahd's lawyer Marc Poupart and Crown prosecutor Anne Aube last appeared in Quebec Court Oct. 14, when the new spring date was decided.

The main evidence against Fahd, which was gathered through a police wiretap, is that she allegedly called a travel agent to buy an airline ticket to Brazil for her son. Poupart has told the court that her intention was to purchase a return ticket and she, in fact, never bought any ticket.

The maximum penalty for the charges against Fahd is seven years of imprisonment.

Some of the delay in her case has been explained by the sheer volume of wiretapping that was recorded. The two lawyers have had to review it and agree on how much of the hours of tape may be admissible as evidence in court.

Poupart said at the time of Fahd's release from custody that the evidence against her is "very, very, very weak" and would not likely be sufficient for a preliminary hearing.

Poupart has not returned several messages from The CJN since the decision to move the case to May.

Steven Slimovitch, legal counsel to B'nai Brith Canada, said that "while we would like to see justice served as quickly as possible, we've got to let this run its course."

He said he "assumes" the defence and prosecution are trying to come to a settlement without having to go to trial.

"I assume, although I have no inside information, there is some kind of attempt to reach a plea bargain on what would be an appropriate punishment," he said.

CIC dismisses Sabeel gathering

Eleanor Johnson, a church spokesperson, told The CJN nothing has changed since that statement. However, three people representing the church's eco-justice committee are scheduled to attend the Sabeel conference, though they are "not there to make policy decisions," Johnson said.

Last month, the worldwide Anglican Consultative Council adopted a resolution recommending that churches put pressure on companies that do business in Israel, including divestment.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, dismissed the Sabeel gathering as "a nothing conference… the momentum for divestment is petering out in the United States."

Indeed, according to the Forward, the Episcopal (Anglican) Church of America voted earlier this month to reject divestment from Israel, leading some Jewish organizations to claim that they had successfully beaten back the threat of a broad, liberal Protestant boycott.

The Episcopal decision "signifies that the corner has been turned on divestment," said Ethan Felson, the point man on the issue for the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, a coalition of 13 national Jewish organizations and 122 local Jewish communities.

Jewish groups, the Forward added, "have engaged Protestant leaders in intensive dialogue, leading to a number of decisions turning away from divestment."

But the larger global threat of divestment has not disappeared. The World Council of Churches voted in February to commend the U.S. Presbyterian divestment campaign.

examines the resurgence of violent antisemitism and terrorism that threatens Europe and all of Western civilization. It explores the dangerous Islamic extremism and culture of death being preached from the mosques of Europe's major cities and developed on the recent attacks in Madrid and London. It examines the new Neo-Nazism in Germany and the shift from the traditional anti-semitism of the right to the antisemitism of the extreme left, and it raises disturbing questions about our future.

Toronto women repay kindness

Most gas stations were either closed or out of fuel, but they finally spotted an open station and the out-of-town passengers naturally offered to pay for the fill-up.

"When we went back in the car, they had chicken and french fries for us," Raxlin said.

"They were so concerned about us."

As the Derrys dropped them off at the airport, Raxlin and Skrip made a solemn promise.

"We gave them $100 and said when we get back home, we're gong to help you," Raxlin said.

After finally flying home and learning that the Derrys had exhausted their savings after shuttling from one shelter to another, Raxlin and Skrip stayed true to their word.

"After what they did for us, we were just compelled to help them," Raxlin says.

Today, the Derrys are renting a home in Shreveport, La.

"We need to [raise more than the $15,000 they've raised so far]. This isn't enough," Raxlin said.

As for Ryan Lewis, the doorman, he lost his home and has kept in touch with Raxlin and Skrip, who would also like to give him some financial support.

Raxlin and Skrip intend to return to New Orleans in February for Mardi Gras to pump some badly needed tourist dollars back into the city's economy.

In reflecting on the harrowing experience, Raxlin said it taught her a valuable lesson about humanity.

"In times of distress, it doesn't matter whether you're black or white or rich or poor, people pull together," she said.

Donations can be sent to Scotiabank trust account 02022-0066923 under the name Evelyn Derry.

גידי קורן וחברים

החטיפה-הכחשתה את שבוי קיץ

"...אבל מה היית עושה, אמא, לו היו חוטפים לך ילד?" משפט מצמרר זה ששאלה בתה של הסופרת הצליח כצליפה מילולית ליצור חבור למציאות ולהבהיר שמשהו חריג ואיום קורה, מתוודה האם, בהקדמה לספרה.

תודה מכבי תל אביב

Centre for child victims of domestic abuse opens in Israel

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Rhodie Blanshay Benaroch loved children – her own three, of course, but also those in Israel who did not have the advantages most of us take for granted.

Blanshay Benaroch did not live to see her children grow up. She died suddenly at age 35 in May 2001. She also did not get the chance to complete a project in Israel benefiting those she described as the smallest victims of domestic abuse.

That task has now been completed in her memory by her mother, Anita Blanshay, and her uncle, Anita's brother, Arnie Bercovitch, and the many people who contributed to the fundraising campaign they led.

The Rhodie Blanshay Benaroch Activity Centre is a new wing of the Na'amat Canada Glickman Centre for Family Violence Prevention in Moaz Aviv, a Tel Aviv suburb. The brightly coloured new wing provides 35 children living with their mothers at the shelter with a place of their own where they can learn and play. It includes a baby nursery, kindergarten, audiovisual/computer area, library and outdoor playground, within a secure compound.

As a young Na'amat leader, Rhodie attended the official opening in 1996 of the Glickman Centre and was struck by how unfair it was that innocent children from troubled homes should suffer further by not having a pleasant and nurturing environment while they are at the shelter, which may be up to a year, said Blanshay. Babies have even been born while their mothers were at the shelter.

The centre was the first formal shelter built in the Tel Aviv area and accommodates about 16 women at a time, she said. Demand for places has been increasing, with 150 requests for help coming in each month.

"The Glickman centre is the state-of-the art in Israel, and the children's wing is one of a kind among shelters in Israel, and maybe in North America, too," Blanshay said.

The wing's recent opening was marked in Montreal by a tribute dinner to Blanshay and Bercovitch, held by Na'amat Canada's Montreal chapter. Blanshay made it her goal as Na'amat national president to realize the project within her three-year term, which ended in September. She continues to raise money for the operation and maintenance of the wing.

Rhodie Blanshay Benaroch, who died in 2001, is seen planting a tree in Israel.

The evening was bittersweet as Rhodie, known for her contagious smile, was remembered by her mother, uncle, sister and eldest daughter, now 12.

"Tonight is a peak of my life. I've climbed many mountains and reached many plateaus with Na'amat, but they can't compare with this one," said Blanshay, a member of Na'amat for nearly 40 years and one of its top fundraisers.

"Rhodie was so moved, yet so upset at the opening of the Glickman centre. She was just 30 and couldn't understand why the children didn't have a special area where they could be treated like her own, cared for and spoiled a little. She could not have known her life would be cut so short… She was just in the midst of developing her dream when she died. I vowed to finish her vision."

Rhodie, the oldest of Blanshay's three daughters, was carrying on the family tradition of helping people in Israel, passed on from her mother and grandmother, Rose Bercovitch, also a leader of Na'amat (then Pioneer Women).

One of her other Na'amat projects was bringing popular children's author Robert Munsch to Montreal in 2000, an event that has continued to take place in her memory. Munsch stayed with Rhodie, her doctor husband Thierry, two daughters and son, and was so taken with the lively family that he wrote a story about them, that can be found on his website.

He will be in Montreal for Na'amat again Dec. 4, for two shows at Oscar Peterson Hall, with the proceeds going toward books for the library at the Rhodie Blanshay Benaroch centre.

Blanshay's "big brother" Bercovitch, a businessman, readily became her partner in the quest to fulfil Rhodie's dream.

"We have lost a bright and beautiful young woman, who has left us a wonderful legacy," said Bercovitch.

Susie Blanshay said her older sister would be proud to see the project brought to fruition. Rhodie had eagerly taken on the mantle of Na'amat, an organization that had been such a major influence when they were growing up.

"I remember when I was 13 and at a new school, someone asked me what my father [Sidney] did. I said he was a dentist and made a comfortable living so our mother could do the important work of raising money for women and children in Israel."

Shonnie Benaroch said she remembered her mother always being on the phone organizing events on behalf of Na'amat. "She taught us the importance of volunteer work and helping Israel, that she learned from her mother. I hope to uphold those values."

She thanked her grandmother Anita for keeping the family bond strong after her mother's tragic death. Rhodie's other children are Tali, 10, and Lee, 8.

Prof. Sylvia Bashevkin, the first woman and the first Jew to be named principal of University of Toronto's University College (UC), hopes to establish the college's first course on the Canadian Jewish experience.

The college's Canadian studies program – which Bashevkin headed for two years – now offers courses on the Asian and African Canadian experience, "and given the prominence of Canadian Jews, I would like to see us explore [their] presence.

"U of T is Canada's largest university, and we should be addressing the Jewish [experience.]"

It is important to remember, she says, that such a course would attract students who do not have a Jewish background. "We would be reaching out and teaching others about the Jewish community. [Putting together the course] would not take a lot of work. It is [definitely] doable."

Originally from Massachusetts, Bashevkin, 51, has been at U of T since 1982 and has been a full professor since 1991. She has been vice-principal of UC since 2004, and was named principal for a six-year term.

Best known for her research in the field of women and politics, she has served as president of the Canadian Political Science Association and the women and politics research section of the American Political Science Association.

She is the author of such books as Welfare Hot Buttons: Women, Work and Social Policy Reform; Women on the Defensive: Living Through Conservative Times; and Toeing the Lines: Women and Party Politics in English Canada. She also edited Women's Work is Never Done: Comparative Studies in Caregiving, Employment and Social Policy Reform, and she has written a number of journal articles and chapters in books.

Bashevkin says she grew up in a "fairly traditional Conservative [Jewish] home in a town with one precarious synagogue, at a time when the women's movement was palpable in North America. It was impossible not to be affected by the idea of women's equality."

She became interested in women and politics while a graduate student at the University of Michigan and York University.

"I was struck by the lack of research into women as political actors, [as opposed] to how much was happening in the real world of women. The obstacles they faced were not covered," she said.

"I was particularly interested in the treatment of poor women, and I found nothing. Sometimes you go into a field because of the absence of [research]."

She can name a number of remarkable Jewish women on the Canadian political scene, "and some such as Elinor Caplan came up from the grassroots. She became active because of a local issue that bothered her.

"A lot of women become active because of a community issue and just keep going. Men [on the other hand] see it more as a career. They move into [the political scene] with the ambition of moving up."

When cities amalgamate, she says, there is less opportunity for women to become inyolved in politics.

"There will be fewer women because there will be fewer [seats], and the opportunity to get into the system will be limited. The grassroots will then drop off," Bashevkin says.

"If there is a reduction in seats, can people who care see a way to do some good in the political process?"

London, England, offers more opportunity for citizen engagement, says Bashevkin, because it has created new levels of municipal government. "A city that offers more has more opportunity for women to become involved.

"Can we [in Toronto] continue to foster a strong democratic culture if there are fewer opportunities for people to get into the political process?"

In its 150 years, UC has been home to many distinguished members of the Canadian Jewish community, she says, "and our Jewish alma maters have contributed enormously. UC is a microcosm of Canadian society at its best. It has [always stood] for a non-sectarian, socially inclusive education of undergraduates."

In the late 19th century, UC welcomed immigrants from all backgrounds, says Bashevkin, and it was among the first in Canada to allow women to teach co-ed classes.

"We have a long tradition of having a diverse faculty, and we have attracted people who could have gone to a sectarian college but chose UC because of its high academic standards and good mixture of people," she says.

"They had a choice, and they came here so they could meet people not like themselves. They were mavericks, and that is the best of Canada."

Wolfe first Jewish honorary fellow at St. Mike's College

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Rose Wolfe, chancellor emerita of University of Toronto has become the first Jew to be named an honorary fellow at the school's St. Michael's College.

She is being recognized, said college president Richard Alway, both for the exceptional job she did as chancellor of the university from 1991 to 1997 and for her leadership in relations between Christians and Jews.

"[Rose] put a warm and human face on a role that can be largely ceremonial. She enlivened countless convocation ceremonies," Alway said.

She has also attended the college's annual lecture series and symposium that deals with issues common to Jews, Christians and Muslims, he said.

"We live in the most multicultural community in the world, and we try to reinforce and encourage initiatives that brings scholars together to discuss issues.

"Hopefully, this will build greater familiarity between groups and greater understanding and amity. Rose embodies this feeling."

Wolfe, wife of the late Ray Wolfe, the founding president of The Canadian Jewish News under its current ownership, graduated from U of T in 1939 with a social work degree.

Among volunteer positions, she is a director of The CJN, has served as chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region's joint community relations committee, and was the first female head of what is now known as UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

She is a longtime fundraiser and supporter of U of T, and played a vital role in raising funds for its Jewish studies program and in helping the university endow four chairs and one professorship in the area of Jewish and Israeli studies.

Rose Wolfe

She is a member of the Order of Ontario and the Order of Canada and has been awarded an honorary doctor of laws degree from U of T for her contribution to Canadian philanthropy and volunteerism, as well a doctor of sacred letters from the university's Trinity College.

She has also received the human relations award from the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

Being named an honorary follow of the college is very special to her, she said.

"I was surprised, excited and honoured. Not only am I the first Jew, but I am the first honorary fellow who has had a transient relationship with the college.

"I got to know people there from the events I have attended and I admire them for their interfaith work. [People at the college] put their money where their mouth is. They believe in interfaith relations, and they foster them quietly. Their work does not make headlines."

WorldPride organizers hope to create social change

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

To Noa Sattath, the Jerusalem Open House is more than a place where lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered (LGBT) people can come together and feel safe.

Sattath, the chair of the JOH, a grassroots activist organization, sees her centre as a way to create social change by providing services that will educate people and erase socially constructed barriers.

"Jerusalem is a population that is composed of a third Palestinian people, a third ultra-Orthodox people and a third secular and conservative Jews, and I think that Jerusalem is perhaps the most religious city in the world with an LGBT centre. It presents us with tremendous challenges, but also with tremendous opportunity to create change," said Sattath, who spoke to a gathering of about 20 students last week at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto.

Because of Jerusalem's diversity, both cultural and religious, Sattath and the rest of the volunteers at JOH have made a special effort to appeal to all LGBT people, regardless of ethnic or religious background.

This is what distinguishes JOH from other centres around the world, said Sattath, who was invited to U of T by Kulanu, a Hillel-affiliated group for Jewish LGBT students.

"There is a huge amount of religious participation in the Jerusalem Open House. But the relationship between the religious and the secular populations in Israel is very tenuous. So for us to be in a place where we can discuss religion and we interact and create our own service for a wide array of denominations is very unique," Sattath said.

The JOH also boasts another ground-breaking service called the "Arab outreach initiative," which aims to build bridges between Israelis and Palestinians.

"When we started the Arab outreach initiative, we knew only two Palestinian people, and we hired one of them. In the last pride parade in Jerusalem, we had more than 200 Palestinian participants," she said.

"The Jerusalem Open House is the only place that I know of in which Israelis and Palestinians are working together towards a common cause that is not conflict-related."

Sattath noted that Jerusalem is getting ready to host WorldPride next summer. The international event was supposed to happen this past August but was postponed due to Israel's pullout from Gaza, which was scheduled for the same time.

Only the second of its kind – the first was held five years ago in Rome – WorldPride will be held from Aug. 6 to 12 and will feature events such as a beach party in Tel Aviv, a parade, a film festival and an interfaith conference.

Sattath said that although there are many gay pride parades all over the world each year, none can compare to the experience of the one in Jerusalem.

"Pride in Jerusalem is very unique. It's is not like pride around the world. It is not a parade, it is a march where anyone can participate. For me it is a life-changing event."

"A lot of people from North America who will come to [World]Pride in Israel will rediscover the meaning of pride," she said.

But Sattath said putting together such an event in one of the world's most religious cities will not come without obstacles.

She told the Wolfond Centre gathering that Jerusalem Mayor Uri Lupoliansky took the organizers of the fourth Jerusalem Pride march – titled Love Without Borders – to court last June in the hope they would be banned from using a public park for the event.

Protester stabbed three people

Not only did the court rule in favour of the organizers, she said, but Lupoliansky was ordered to provide a venue and administrative resources for the event, which boasted a record turnout of 10,000 people.

But the obstacles didn't end with the court ruling, as participants encountered opposition in the form of about 700 protesters. But the pride marchers were protected by about 800 police officers, headed by Jerusalem Police Chief Ilan Franko.

Yet despite the police presence, one protester managed to get past security and stab three people.

Sattath said the attacks spurred her to be even more active in the campaign to hold WorldPride in the city.

Sattath said InterPride, the international association of LGBT pride co-ordinators that licenses the event, "made a very brave decision in 2003 to choose to hold WorldPride in Jerusalem."

Despite the opposition, Sattath said she will continue to organize pride marches in order to make Jerusalem a city that embraces diversity in all its forms.

"I'm very proud to be part of this event."

In order to make it easier for people from all over the world to come to Israel for WorldPride, Sattath said she is negotiating to have a birthright israel trip coincide with the event.

PA announces security reform plan

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority appears to be on the verge of its long-awaited security reform in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

But Sunday's announcement of a plan to incorporate the Al-Aqsa Brigade into the Palestinian Authority (PA) police still falls far short of the comprehensive crackdown on terrorists required by the U.S.-led "road map" peace plan.

And with Palestinians killed by Israeli forces in the West Bank over the weekend, hopes that Israel's Gaza pullout would encourage peacemaking could prove short-lived.

"We have agreed today to establish five new camps for training and hosting the 'stragglers,'" PA Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia told reporters, referring to the fragmented forces of the Al-Aqsa Brigade.

Qureia said the effort would begin in Ramallah and in Nablus, one of the most volatile cities in the West Bank.

PA officials said the brigade, a terrorist group linked to the PA's dominant Fatah faction, would be reined in within weeks.

But it was unclear whether Abbas would be able to carry out this plan, which makes no provision for disarming and dismantling the more powerful Islamist terrorist groups led by Hamas.

Israel took a wait-and-see attitude.

"We have heard this sort of declaration before. The time has come for action," said one Jerusalem official.

Israel taking 'a wait-and-see attitude'

Palestinian security forces have been weakened by Israeli attacks and by internal divisions, and militias such as Al-Aqsa have stepped in to fill much of the void.

With Hamas set to take part in PA parliamentary elections in January, an armed confrontation between its gunmen and Fatah is increasingly unlikely.

There is quiet hope building that Palestinian moderates will win out over the Islamist extremists in the landmark poll.

Israeli officials have backed off from the suggestion made last month by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon that they might try to block Hamas participation in the election.

"It is not in Israel's interest," Justice Minister Tzipi Livni told Israel Radio.

Islamic Jihad on Monday vowed "blood for blood" for the killing of one of its most senior members in an Israel Defense Forces (IDF) raid in the West Bank the night before, and suggested the months-long truce could be on the verge of collapse. Luai Saadi – one of two Palestinian gunmen killed by IDF soldiers in the Tul Karm shootout – led the cell responsible for a number of attacks on Israeli targets, including suicide bombings at the Stage nightclub in Tel Aviv in February and at a Netanya mall in July. A total of 10 people were killed and dozens of others wounded in the two attacks.

The Palestinian Authority on Monday slammed the raid as counterproductive.

"We condemn the Israeli incursion and assassinations in Tul Karm. This threatens the ceasefire we're trying to maintain," said chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat.

The army said Palestinians opened fire on them as they surrounded a house during an arrest operation in the city's refugee camp. An IDF soldier was lightly hurt in the shooting.

The Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades identified the other gunman as Majed al-Aksar, a member of the group.

"Our retaliation for this crime will be unprecedented," said Abu Abdallah, a spokesman for the Islamic Jihad military wing in Gaza.

The group said in a statement: "We will not stand handcuffed while the blood of our fighters is being shed... Let calm go to hell."

"Our reaction will be commensurate to the rank of the man," said Abu Al-Qassam, a leader of the Islamic Jihad political wing. "The Israelis will pay dearly."

The gun battle began when a Palestinian opened fire on troops from a car, the IDF said. Soldiers returned fire, killing the man. Camp residents said the vehicle, a white Subaru, had been hit by dozens of bullets.

Nearby, an armed Palestinian aimed his weapon at soldiers and prepared to shoot at them, the army said. Soldiers opened fire, killing him.

Indirect co-ordination with other Arab states

Several Arab newspapers reported last week that Israeli officials would also meet on the issue with counterparts from other Arab states, including Syria and Iraq. Israeli officials denied the reports. They did say, however, that since Jordan was co-ordinating its moves with both Israel and with its Arab neighbors, there would be indirect co-ordination between Israel and other Arab states. However, they said, there will be no direct contacts.

Pokomonsky said that the ministry had made preparations to cope with bird flu as far back as 2003, when the virus first broke out in Southeast Asia, and that over the past few months, it has updated its data and re-examined its diagnostic methods. Israel is now prepared should the virus spread here, he said.

Pokomonsky said that every suspect bird is examined in one of the Veterinary Service's four regional laboratories. The test gives initial results within a day and a definitive diagnosis in four to five days. "The number of labs and the existing staff are sufficient to meet our requirements, even if and when the problem of bird flu arises," he said.

Health Ministry Director General Avi Yisraeli, however, said that it was not a question of "if," only of "when." Speaking at a media conference last week, Yisraeli said that a local outbreak of bird flu was "only a matter of time, and likely to happen soon, because of migrating birds that are liable to carry the disease from Turkey, Greece or Romania."

The disease, he stressed, is not a danger to the public, since it can only be caught directly from a live bird, and so cannot be contracted by eating cooked fowl. The main worry is the economic damage that the flu could wreak on Israel's poultry industry, he said.

Manfred Green, head of the Israel Center for Disease Control in the Health Ministry, said that people who rush to purchase the flu medicine Tamiflu to protect themselves against bird flu were "throwing money in the garbage." Moreover, he said, it is not even clear that Tamiflu is effective against bird flu, and even if it is, widespread usage could enable the virus to develop resistance to the medicine.

Unlike the general public, farmers and veterinary personnel who work directly with infected birds are vulnerable to the disease. Israel has therefore purchased approximately 420,000 doses of flu medicine, at a cost of NIS 44 million, enough to treat about six per cent of the population.

The Health Ministry plans to ask for an additional NIS 200 million to buy enough medicine to treat a quarter of the population, as most western European states plan to do. Although the current strain of bird flu is not dangerous to humans, the expectation is that such a strain will eventually appear, though possibly not for years.

If there is a local outbreak of the flu, the Agriculture Ministry will order all birds in the vicinity of the outbreak destroyed, in an attempt to prevent the disease from spreading.

Meanwhile, officials in Hungary said last week that preliminary experiments with a vaccine for this strain of bird flu, known as H5N1, indicate that the treatment works.

Health Minister Jenoe Racz said that he and dozens of others were inoculated three weeks ago, and tests showed that antibodies to the virus had appeared in their blood.

"The results are preliminary, but I can say with 99.9 per cent certainty that the vaccine works," he said in Budapest.

The World Health Organization said that it was unaware of the details of the Hungarian findings and was unable to comment on their validity or on whether the vaccine, even if it works, would be viable.

Scientists in the United States have already reported positive results from tests with their own H5N1 vaccine, but so far have been unable to make the vaccine a practical option, because it uses too much of a scarce ingredient and requires two doses to be effective.

Sharon pursues immigration

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon vowed that Israel would bring in one million new immigrants by 2020. The prime minister made the pledge while hosting soldiers who recently immigrated to Israel at his sukkah in Jerusalem. "Israel must have a large Jewish population," he said. "I have ordered the government to make this a main objective."

Diamond dealer missing

Terrorists are suspected in the disappearance of an Israeli businessman in Greece. Diamond dealer Shmuel Levy, 66, went missing earlier this month while on a business trip to Greece. Police believe he was abducted from his rented apartment. The fact that his documents and diamonds went untouched has raised the possibility that the motivation behind the incident was political rather than criminal. Levy's family, noting that several foreigners have gone missing in Greece in recent years, demanded that the Israeli government press officials in Athens to determine what happened to the businessman.

Israeli captured in Iraq

An Israeli is among the more than 300 foreign fighters captured in Iraq by U.S. forces, a U.S. commander said. But Maj.-Gen. Rick Lynch, who divulged the news, refused to give more details on the Israeli captured. Most of those captured since April are from Arab countries, with Egypt, Syria, the Sudan and Saudi Arabia leading the way.

PA claims crackdown

The Palestinian Authority announced it has stopped a wave of attacks by Gaza Strip terrorists against Israel. In a report published last week, the PA Interior Ministry said police foiled 17 attempted attacks since Israel completed its Gaza pullout on Sept. 12. Police also confiscated 17 rockets and 75 bombs, and prevented seven attempts to smuggle in arms, he said.

Bush presses Israel, PA

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — Getting a fix on U.S. President George W. Bush's vision of a resolution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict depends on how far into the future you want to look.

In the short term, he expects Israel to clamp down on its settlement expansion and resume security and economic talks with the Palestinians.

Further down the line, he appears to be less confident than ever about the timing of Palestinian statehood.

In his news conference last Thursday with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, Bush outlined clear goals for the short term, and he laid much of the burden on Israel, demanding an immediate easing of living conditions for the Palestinians.

"Israel must continue to work with Palestinian leaders to help improve the daily lives of Palestinians," Bush said.

His statement was seen as a clear rebuke to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's decision last week to suspend security talks with the Palestinians in the wake of the killings the previous weekend of three Jewish settlers.

Bush also said the Palestinians must do more to confront terrorists. "The way forward must begin by confronting the threat that armed gangs pose to a genuinely democratic Palestine," he said.

Long term, however, Bush appeared to be backing away from an earlier hope to see a Palestinian state by the end of his term in January 2009 and studiously ignoring Abbas' appeals for a return to final-status talks.

"I believe that two democratic states living side by side in peace is possible. I can't tell you when it's going to happen," Bush said when he was asked about his stated hope last year that he would see a Palestinian state before he left office.

That itself was a revision of an earlier deadline of this year, which he had outlined in 2002 and which later became the basis for the "road map" peace plan, put forth by the United States, Russia, the United Nations and the European Union.

"And the reason I can't is because there will be moments of progress and there will be moments of setback," he said.

Throughout his remarks last Thursday, Bush voiced a greater appreciation of the intractability of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict than he publicly has before.

"I understand it's hard," he said at one point. "Things don't happen overnight. Old feuds aren't settled immediately. And it takes a while."

He also alluded to an element in short supply after four years of violence – trust.

A lot of these issues that have been "very difficult for a long period of time become easier to resolve as there's more trust between the parties," Bush said. And trust becomes a permanent part of the political process "as action on the ground takes place."

Such talk threw cold water on Abbas' repeated pleas for a fast track to final-status talks.

In his remarks, Abbas urged Bush to revive "talks on permanent-status issues regarding Jerusalem, refugees, settlements, borders and water in order to reach, at the end, peace, which would allow for the establishment of an independent democratic Palestinian state on all the territories occupied in 1967."

Bush would not take the bait, but Abbas still left with a few plums.

Bush was blunt about his demand that Israel freeze settlement expansion.

"Israel should not undertake any activity that contravenes its 'road map' obligations or prejudices the final-status negotiations with regard to Gaza, the West Bank and Jerusalem," he said.

"This means that Israel must remove unauthorized posts and stop settlement expansion."

The U.S. president was also uncompromising on the barrier Israel is building to protect itself from security attacks. Israeli officials have insisted recently that Israel is doing all it can to keep it from impinging on the lives of Palestinians, but Bush didn't appear to buy it.

"Israeli leaders must take into account the impact the security barrier has on Palestinians not engaged in terrorist activities," he said.

He also backed a link between the West Bank and Gaza, reopening the crossing between Gaza and Egypt and reopening the Gaza seaport. Israel wants security guarantees in place before it agrees to any of the projects.

Bush also suggested he would use U.S. muscle to back his demands.

"We are holding people to account on the pledges that both the Palestinians and the Israelis have made on the road map," Bush said. "And we do so publicly, and we do so privately."

Bush also said he would extend the mandates of the U.S. economic and security envoys to the region, showing he was not backing away from the region.

Bush sidestepped Israel's demand that the Palestinians keep Hamas and other terror groups from participating in legislative elections in January.

On that score, he accepted Abbas' commitment to keep "armed gangs" from disrupting the elections – which falls far short of a ban on Hamas. Abbas repeated a pledge to introduce legislation to disarm militias after the elections.

The American Israel Public Affairs Committee, the pro-Israel lobby, had been lobbying Congress and the media all week to call for a ban on Hamas.

A congressional letter warning Abbas that failure to keep Hamas out of the elections could inflict "serious damage" on relations with the United States garnered the signatures of 49 lawmakers, including the entire leadership of the U.S. House of Representatives and the majority of the members of its international relations committee.

A State Department spokesperson later suggested that Bush did not want to be seen as interfering in the Palestinian electoral process.

"From our perspective," State Department spokesperson Sean McCormack said, "how the Palestinian political process unfolds and evolves is a question for the Palestinian people."

The United States would be hard-pressed to keep Hamas out of elections, considering that it turned a blind eye to armed militias running in recent Lebanese and Iraqi elections, said Robert Blecher, who heads a team seeking solutions to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict at Strategic Assessments, a Washington think tank.

"The United States has had a hard time coming to a position on this," Blecher said. "It's caught between a rock and hard place – there are pretty clear parallels."

Israeli officials said Bush's demands of Israel were expected. And they took heart in Bush's emphatic endorsement of the success of Israel's withdrawal last month from Gaza, which he called "a bold decision with historic significance."

Forty years after its dedication ceremony in May 1965, the Israel Museum is in the midst of an anniversary year that it is marking with a series of eclectic exhibitions highlighting the masterpieces in its vast collection.

One recent exhibition, "The Beauty of Sanctity: Masterworks from Every Age," selectively highlighted key works in many departments, reflecting a wide range of historical periods and artistic mediums. Although this particular exhibition finishes soon, many of the highlighted items continue to be displayed. They include the recently acquired Rembrandt canvas St. Peter in Prison, the Paul Klee painting Angelus Novus and a marble Venus unearthed in an archeological dig at Beit Shean.

Other anniversary-related exhibits have focused on everything from ideals of beauty in Africa and the Americas to landscape photographs and daguerreotypes from the early 19th century to the present.

Although the museum possesses some 250,000 works of its own, its curators also put a few borrowed items on display, including a Rembrandt painting on loan from the Ottawa-based National Gallery of Canada. Art historians have long debated whether the central character in Rembrandt's Heroine from the Old Testament (Esther or Bathsheba) is the pious Esther or the seductive Bathsheba.

Four important illuminated Hebrew manuscripts from the Vatican Library are also on view.

Students of the towering 12th-century Jewish philosopher Moses Maimonides will appreciate the magnificently illustrated 15th-century manuscript of the Rambam's Mishneh Torah. Also on view is the Arba'ah Turim, Jacob ben Asher's famous legal text. The 15th-century North Italian manuscript also features lavish illustrations in the Renaissance style.

The other Vatican items are a complete Hebrew Bible codex and a book of Psalms, both produced in Rome in the 13th century. Among the earliest such manuscripts in existence, both are decorated with exquisite floral and zoomorphic motifs illuminated in gold.

A vast and sprawling complex on a Jerusalem hilltop, the Israel Museum complex is also home to the Shrine of the Book, which is home to various parchments of the Dead Sea scrolls. The terraced complex also boasts a large sculpture garden.

The museum is in the planning stages of a proposed renovation, set to begin in two years at a cost of about $50 million (US). Scheduled tours in English are available daily and are free with admission. The museum's phone number is 972-2-670-8811 and its website is www.imj.org.il

The Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum and Christie's present a "pARTy Auction" in celebration of the Museum's 40 years. The event features a live auction of works by top Canadian and international artists as well as exclusive lunch and dinner opportunities. Works include Dale Chihuly's Cadmium Yellow Persian Set with Onyx Lip Wraps, valued at $30,000 (US).

Funds raised will provide free museum admission for Israeli and Arab youth. Sutton Place Hotel, Stop 33, Nov. 8, 6 p.m. weisen@sympatico.ca

Prime skillfully rehashes an old theme

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ben Younger's delicious comedy, Prime, scheduled to open in local theatres on Oct. 28, turns on the timeless theme of boy meets girl.

In this case, since the boy is Jewish and the girl is not, the boy's mother is simply appalled.

We've been there before in film and in literature, but Prime, with its stellar cast, holds an audience well amused for almost two hours.

The plot is hackneyed, yet it works.

Uma Thurman as Rafi Gardet.

Dave Bloomberg (Bryan Greenberg), a 23-year-old aspiring painter, woos Rafi Gardet (Uma Thurman), a career woman who's 14 years his senior, recently divorced, and – gevalt – not even Jewish.

Dave, a hunk of a guy from Brooklyn, is infatuated with Rafi, a willowy blond goddess from the Upper East Side. And while she appreciates his interest and ardour, she is concerned about their considerable age difference.

That's not the only issue bedevilling their budding relationship. When Dave's mother and Rafi's therapist, played by Meryl Streep, gradually figures out that her client is dating her son, she reverts to form and strongly advises him that a Jewish girl would be far preferable.

Meryl Streep as therapist Lisa Metzger.

It falls on Streep, playing Lisa Metzger in the film, to reconcile her professional duties with her maternal instincts.

In several uproarious scenes, one of which focuses on Dave's private parts and his sexual dalliances, Younger deftly exploits this sticky situation to the hilt.

Streep, whose talent for foreign accents is renowned, physically reinvents herself in Prime. Sporting an Orthodox-like wig and prim glasses, she is the epitome of a distinctly dowdy Jewish woman struggling to put her son onto what she regards as the right path.

The film, which makes a passing allusion to the Warsaw ghetto in reference to Jewish-gentile relations, stresses the importance of Jewish continuity to a fairly traditional person like Metzger.

Although she likes Rafi, likeably portrayed by Thurman, she cannot shake the visceral fear that her dear son may marry a Christian woman who is nearly old enough to be his mother.

In a heart-to-heart talk with Dave, which boils down to an implicit indictment of his taste and judgment, she underlines the point that religion is of paramount importance in relationships.

But Dave, played by newcomer Greenberg with gruff charm and endearing innocence, pays her no heed and proceeds to romance Rafi, the quintessential shiksa.

Prime, a comedic disquisition on the perils and delights of assimilation, has one particularly funny flashback that deals with religious and racial differences.

When Dave introduces his African American girlfriend to his stereotypical immigrant grandmother, she blanches and asks incredulously, "Is she black?"

These are moments to savour in a film that's not afraid to poke fun at societal conventions.

TJFF TO BRING IN SCHOOL V.P. FOR SCREENING OF PAPER CLIPS

Seven years ago, a group of students in Whitwell, an isolated town in the mountains of Tennessee, began collecting paper clips as a means of understanding the magnitude of six million, the number of Jews who perished in the Holocaust. Their teachers wanted them to realize what could happen when prejudice and hate get out of control.

Soon word of their project spread and packages of paper clips began arriving by mail from all over the world. This inspiring tale is the subject of Paper Clips, a spine-tingling documentary that recently went into theatrical release.

Having collected an impressive array of awards, Paper Clips is being screened this month at a Chai Tea event sponsored by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival. The festival has arranged to bring in Whitwell Middle School's vice-principal David Smith and perhaps a student to give attendees an experience they wouldn't get in an ordinary theatre.

The film distributor apparently reneged on a promise that the festival would have first crack at showing Paper Clips here, said festival executive director Helen Zukerman, who admitted to being annoyed that the film had already gone into general release. "It's disappointing for us but it's a new year and I'll give the distributor the benefit of the doubt," she said.

Zukerman also noted that Chai Tea attendees will get much more than the usual tea and cookies – they'll also get to hear the vice-principal. The screening is at the Cineplex Sheppard Grande and costs $15. Sunday, Nov. 20; tea 4 p.m., film 5 p.m. 416-324-9121.

Names in the News: Former Torontonian Yerra Sugarman is a New York university-level creative writing instructor who recently won a prestigious United States PEN award for her first poetry collection, Forms of Gone. While she was in Toronto during the High Holy Days, Sugarman revisited her former high school, W.L. Mackenzie C.I., in North York, where she addressed a special assembly of nearly 150 English students.

Sugarman read several poems and some prose, including a letter written by Martin Luther King, Jr. from Birmingham jail. "I basically tried to gear the discussion to the question, 'Why is poetry relevant?' and 'Why does poetry matter?'" she explained, adding that she also briefly reminisced about her years in the school from '74 to '78. (Many of today's Mackenzie students come from all over the city, attracted by the school's special emphasis on math, computers and science.)

Mackenzie principal Helene Green spoke glowingly of Sugarman's visit and her energizing effect on students. "My staff were enthralled by her even before she came, because we had her book in the library and her writing is exquisite," she said. "I think she writes like Wallace Stevens: her work is crystal-clear, succinct and visual. So that was even before she came. When she got here it was really a thrill."

Forms of Gone was published by Sheep Meadow Press and recently came out in a second edition.

Stage Comedy: Three years after his huge success with The First Family, a satiric LP that made polite fun of the Kennedy clan in 1962, New York writer-producer Bob Booker dreamed up You Don't Have To Be Jewish, another comedy recording project featuring sketch comedy, one-liners, rapid-fire gags and original songs. Recorded in Manhattan in 1965, the album became a runaway hit soon after the ensemble's appearance on the Ed Sullivan show. Booker, who is not Jewish, proudly boasts that the record is is still selling even after 40 years.

Launched recently as a stage revival, You Don't Have To Be Jewish is opening in Toronto this month. The cast includes Jamie Farr of *M*A*S*H* fame as well as Avery Saltzman, Theresa Tova, Aviva Hoffman and Matt Baram. It's at Massey Hall, Nov. 19 and 20. Tickets $48-$65. www.roythomson.com or www.youdonthavetobejewish.com.

Cancer, TV and the Holocaust

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

A new Canadian series that recently premiered on The Movie Network and Movie Central focuses on a Jewish family whose life gets torn apart when the mother gets diagnosed with breast cancer.

Terminal City, a 10-part miniseries, is a dark comedy that also ridicules the recent fascination with reality TV.

When Katie Sampson (Maria Del Mar of Blue Murder), a 43-year-old mother of three, goes to the hospital for one of her appointments, she accidently runs into the crew of Post-Op, a failing reality TV show on hospital patients.

Her acerbic wit is an instant hit on the show, and soon she's approached by the producers to replace the dry host.

Meanwhile at home, her family isn't taking too well to her diagnosis. Katie's daughter rebels, her teenage son becomes a pothead, and her little boy becomes obsessed with death and God.

As her husband Ari (Gil Bellows of Ally McBeal fame) tries to cope with it all, his father, a Holocaust survivor, compares everything to his wartime experiences.

"Cancer, television and the Holocaust are disparate, unconventional and powerful themes that are explored in Terminal City," said Michelle Marion, director of Canadian Independent Production at The Movie Network. "Canadian audiences are in for a treat."

With its focus on a family that copes with tragedy, it's bound to be compared to Six Feet Under. Terminal City airs almost daily. Check your listings.

Ari Sampson played by Gil Bellows.

Book reflects post-1948 South African literary scene

Contemporary Jewish Writing in South Africa*, edited by Claudia Braude, David Philip/ University of Nebraska Press.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

In the years leading up to the collapse of apartheid in 1994, South African culture was little-known abroad. The country's scholars and writers found their work shunned internationally, as they were the inadvertent victims of boycotts meant to weaken apartheid's hold on the country. A recent anthology, edited by Johannesburg-based journalist and cultural worker Claudia Braude, reflects a broad reconsideration of the role of South African national culture, while focusing specifically on the role of Jewish writing in South African history and daily life.

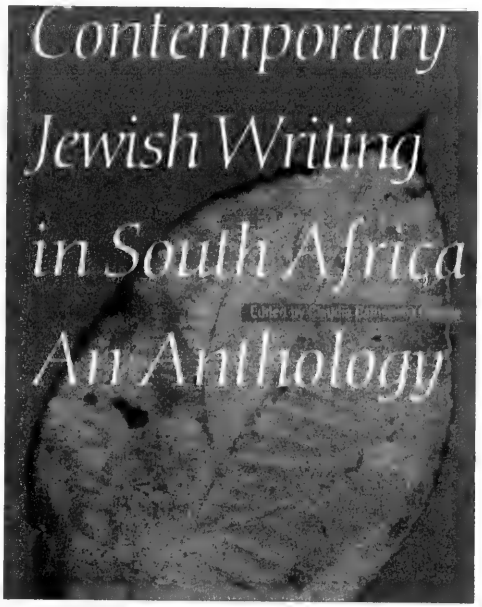
Norman Ravvin

Contemporary Jewish Writing in South Africa opens with Braude's erudite, far-ranging introduction, which describes the shifting and sometimes troubling relationship between the South African state and its Jewish citizens. Major Jewish immigration to South Africa took place, as it did in Canada, from 1880 to 1914. The bulk of its Jewish immigrants were from Lithuania, and brought with them a substantial Yiddish literary culture. Newcomers found themselves involved in the country's mining economy in small communities, or they were drawn to such major centres as Cape Town and Johannesburg. At its height, the community numbered 120,000.

Braude notes that these early eastern European Jews were viewed by the country's Anglo and Afrikaans communities to be "unassimilable" as non-whites. As racial politics came to the fore with the ascendency of an Afrikaans political movement, the question of where Jews would be placed in the racial hierarchy became a source of great anxiety. In the 1930s, rising white supremacist sentiment echoed German ideology, to the extent that white racialist politicians promised a "Nazi-type regime" as part of their election platform.

The defeat of Nazism, and the full exposure of its crimes against Jews, led the South African National Party to jettison overt anti-Semitic platforms. Braude asserts, however, that South African Jews remained fearful of "the potential for state-sponsored anti-Semitism," and the community "sought to demonstrate Jewish whiteness and loyalty to white concerns." This mainstream response, which led to a policy of political noninvolvement, can be contrasted with the important role of leftist Jews in the anti-apartheid movement. Braude adds that this movement's ideal of a nonracial state led its Jewish supporters to downplay and even efface their own ethnic identity and history.

The contributions in Contemporary Jewish Writing in South Africa appeared in print from the 1950s through the early '90s. They reflect a literary era that took shape after the 1948 election of the National Party, and which ended as Nelson Mandela's release from prison signalled the collapse of the apartheid state. Braude is forthright in her introduction about her editorial choices: her goal was to find Jewish authors whose work reflected the "hidden and suppressed aspects of South African history," as well as a movement from "anxiety about Jewish belonging" toward a more direct address of ethnic and religious identity in literature.



Of the 16 contributors, Nadine Gordimer is likely the only one universally known abroad (the standup comic Pieter-Dirk Uys, whose work is also included, has toured major Canadian cities). In Gordimer's story My Father Leaves Home, she examines her ambiguous relationship with her father's eastern European roots, a subject rarely addressed in her celebrated oeuvre. According to Braude, Gordimer's "involvement in the anti-apartheid struggle for a nonracial society can be read in part as a cure for the anxieties concerning Jewish racial status that are manifest in her writing."

Braude recognizes a similar ambivalence in the work of bestselling novelist Sarah Gertrude Millin. Millin's parents were Yiddish-speaking east European immigrants, yet Millin, in a late-career effort to accommodate herself to mainstream society, drew criticism for her novel The Wizard Bird, which "promoted white supremacy." In Contemporary Jewish Writing in South Africa, Millin is represented by a more subtle piece, called Esther's Daughter, which explores Jewish identity while countering "the prevailing colonial views" of the South African majority.

Other selections in the anthology reveal the peculiar ambiguities of Jewish life in South Africa. The best among these include Nehemia Levinsky's In the Shadow of Nuremberg. Translated from the Yiddish, Levinsky's story draws chilling parallels between racial ideology in Nazi Germany and the effects of such ideas in the African countryside. Dan Jacobson's The Zulu and the Zeide is a sensitive rendering of an unequal relationship with a surprising outcome. And, as a representative of a younger generation of writers, Tony Eprile addresses similar themes in his portrait of a young man's recollection of the black nanny who helped raise him.

A hundred years of South African settlement are depicted in Contemporary Jewish Writing in South Africa. In the course of this century, Yiddish-speaking Lithuanian peddlers on the veld are transformed into English-speaking exiles who dream of Johannesburg suburbs from their adopted homes in California and New York. By way of her fine introductory essay and a thoughtfully chosen set of contributors, Braude's anthology conveys this historic panorama with verve and honesty.

Norman Ravvin's recent novel is Lola by Night. He is co-editor of The Canadian Jewish Studies Reader and chairs Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

New electric scooter kosher for Shabbat

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

If you spot Yechiel Glustein entering the Beth Zion Congregation on his motorized three-wheel electric scooter next Shabbat morning, relax.

Glustein recently became, as far as he knows, the first Montreal Jew to take advantage of this latest twinning of technology and Torah when he bought a Shabbat scooter approved by the Zomet Institute for Torah and Technology, an Orthodox organization in Israel that develops and halachically authorizes such devices for use on Shabbat.

Developed by Zomet and Amigo Mobility International in Bridgeport, Mich., the Shabbat Amigo, as it's known, allows people who have trouble walking to get around without violating the laws of Shabbat or Jewish holidays.

Glustein said the Shabbat scooter is being used throughout Israel.

"It's amazing," said Glustein, 75, who ordered his vehicle directly from the United States and uses it to traverse the distance between his Cote St. Luc home and Beth Zion, about five blocks away.

"When I heard about it, I thought: 'This is just what the doctor ordered.'"

The scooter operates on the principle of indirect action, known halachically as gramma, and it's similar in principle to how Shabbat elevators work.

The vehicle has two modes: "Shabbat" and "regular." In the Shabbat mode – which Glustein activates before Shabbat begins – the scooter connects to a separate circuit board and "Shabbat module," which has a special timing circuit that delays initial motion of the scooter by 15 to 20 seconds when someone sits on it.

Since there is no throttle lever activation by the user, this time delay is considered to be an indirect action (gramma) that is permissible under Halachah, the Amigo website explains.

There is even a Shabbat directional switch that uses the same delay. The scooter has no horns or lights that operate on Shabbat, and a failsafe toggle switch prevents a user from accidentally switching to "normal" mode.

The "Shabbat" mode is actually a $1,100 (US) option that can be added to certain existing Amigo scooter models, which start at $1,295 (US).

Every scooter, including Glustein's, is individually certified by a Zomet inspector and can only be used in an area surrounded by an eruv, he said.

For the delighted Glustein, the scooter has been a godsend.

"I don't have to walk to synagogue anymore in a walker," he said. "When I brought the scooter the first time, everybody circled around it, wanting to know why it was permissible. Rabbi [Sidney] Shoham was overwhelmed. My wife Mena is delighted."

Simon Slawner, whose orthopedic supply company J. Slawner Ltd. became Montreal's sole distributor of the Shabbat scooter after hearing about it from Glustein, sees potential for the vehicle among the city's aging Jewish population.

"It's adapting to a way of life that allows us to do what's important to us," he said. "Many years ago, I remember a rabbi saying: 'I don't care how you get to shul, just get to shul!'"

The Shabbat scooter in only one of dozens of innovative devices developed by the Zomet Institute since its founding 27 years ago.

Our Jewish voice

The Days of Awe are over. I feel inspired, renewed, and ready to start a new year with a fresh determination to accomplish my most important personal goals.

I can still hear the ancient melodies of the Yom Kippur service ringing in my ears. All of us standing, and as one, singing along with the chazzan, crying out with our souls' deepest yearnings, as we ask for God's forgiveness for our transgressions over the past year.

While experiencing the joy of participation in the heartfelt singing of the prayers, I recalled a discussion that I once had with some relatives who attend services in a non-Orthodox synagogue. They described how much they enjoy listening to their synagogue's choir, and asked us if we felt remiss by not having a choir at our synagogue. They then cited another synagogue experience at which services were led by a guitar-playing rabbi, and described how much they enjoyed it.

As someone who loves music and musical instruments I could appreciate, to some extent, how one might welcome having a choir or a guitar accompaniment, as a way of enhancing the synagogue service. Yet, deep in my heart, I knew that such accoutrements are not necessary at all.

Our traditional teachings prescribe us to not only read the words in our prayer books, but to actually say them, quietly to ourselves yet loud enough for us to hear our own words, or express them in heartfelt song. There is an important psychology to this. Saying something enlists a greater commitment to believing it, and acting upon it. Hearing our own voice recite or sing the same prayers that have been uttered by countless generations of our Jewish predecessors instills a unique kind of sensitivity and appreciation for that which we are praying.

As we swayed together deep in prayer, a sense of clarity washed over me. No, I didn't want to hear a guitar playing, nor did I want to have a choir sing for me. All I wanted to hear was the melodious, yet warbled chanting of the chazzan, coupled with my own crying out, and that of my Jewish brothers and sisters.

No guitars, no choir. My voice, our voices, one voice together. Our Jewish voice. A totally fulfilling experience, just as it was.

Talk of sanctions against Syria

The United States, Britain and France are weighing their steps cautiously so as not to push Syria into a corner, the sources said.

Tuesday's council session was due to open with a briefing to its members by Mehlis, who headed the international investigation.

The council members are then expected to question Mehlis, especially about the reliability of the witnesses and sources on whom he based his interim report. Mehlis's responses to these questions could contain details about Syrian involvement that he preferred to delete from his interim report.

The resolution that council members are expected to vote on after the report is summed up is unlikely to call for sanctions against Damascus, the sources said.

"Behind closed doors, there is talk of sanctions," one Western diplomat told Ha'aretz, "but this is merely a reminder to Syria that such an option exists."

Although the United States, Britain and France had been working on a draft resolution since last Friday, it was only to be given to council members on Monday. But the resolution was expected to urge Syria to co-operate fully with the international investigators, who have received an extension until Dec. 15 to complete their report.

"The fact that the council is awaiting an additional and final report from Mehlis will also prevent the inclusion of operative punitive measures, such as sanctions, in the current resolution," a senior UN source explained.

Orlando Magic defeat Maccabi Tel Aviv in second NBA game

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

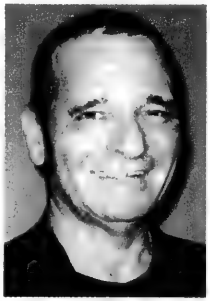
Maccabi Elite Tel Aviv is a sports organization that doesn't like to lose. So when an upstart player from Migdal Haemek scored 53 points against them a few years ago in an Israeli league game, management knew there was only one thing to do – bring him over to their side.

Maccabi made Derrick Sharp an offer he couldn't refuse and the Orlando native moved over to the perennial Israeli powerhouse as a point guard.

Now in his 10th season with the club, Sharp has won three Euroleague titles and in 185 league games has racked up 1,165 points.

Sharp's Maccabi Elite Tel Aviv defeated the Toronto Raptors 105-103 at the Air Canada Centre – the first time an NBA team lost an international match at home – before flying down to Orlando for a pre-season game versus the Magic. Orlando defeated Tel Aviv 93-79.

Sharp was recruited to Maccabi Hadera, a second-division team out of the University of South Florida. Like many other American basketball players, he dreamed of a career in the NBA, but the better opportunity was in Israel. Anthony Parker, Maceo Baston and Will Solomon are other Maccabi players who had stints in the NBA.



Ami Eshel

For Sharp, the Mideast nation wasn't an entirely unknown quantity. Several university players a year ahead of him had gone to play in Israel and "I heard from them how it was."

He never worried about the security situation. "They assured us it was safe and not like it's [shown] on TV. Israel is not more dangerous than parts of New York and California and even Toronto," he said.

Sharp is quite familiar with the Toronto area. His second wife, Justine Ellison, is a former University of Toronto star who now plays for Maccabi's women's team and who's been named player of the year.

Sharp spends his summers split between Ellison's home in Dundas, Ont., and his family's home in Orlando.

In the game against the Toronto Raptors, Sharp played only 9:21 and was shut out. But at a reception for the team at the home of Toronto businessman Gerry Schwartz, Sharp told the guests how happy he was to play for the Maccabi organization.

He's even become an Israeli citizen, something he did when he married his first wife, an Israeli woman, originally from Morocco.

Sharp has lived in Israel for 10 years. "I like to be part of the [Israeli] people, the passion they have for themselves and for other Jewish people," he said. It's like being part of a big family.

He's been with the team for five years, has won two Euroleague championships and been named to the 2004-05 all-star team.

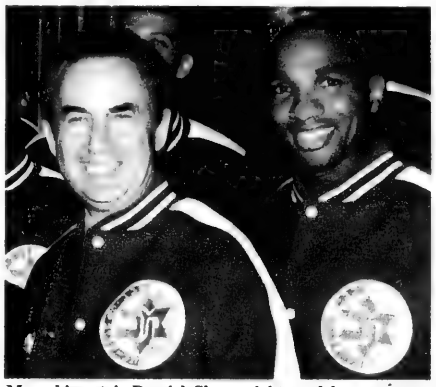
In 64 Euroleague games for Maccabi, he's scored 992 points.

Against the Raptors he was a force, registering a double double with 21 points and 10 rebounds.

"It's a special feeling to play for Maccabi Tel Aviv," Vujcic said. "It's something special for the people of Israel."

Vujcic believes there are similarities between Israel and Croatia. Both share a Mediterranean atmosphere where people are "hot [with] a positive craz[iness]."

Vujcic had no concerns about safety before moving to Israel. After all, he said, Croatia had recently emerged from a war and he knew that "on TV, things are worse."



Maccabi captain Derrick Sharp, right, models a new team jacket at a dinner hosted by Gerry Schwartz.

The day before Maccabi Elite Tel Aviv's matchup with the Toronto Raptors, general manager Ami Eshel was predicting "war."

Maccabi Tel Aviv, he said, does not look at games as merely a friendly encounter. "We try to win" every game. "It's a challenge and Maccabi doesn't like to lose any game. It's part of the spirit of Maccabi."

The organization's large footprint on Israeli basketball – they've won 45 league championships – does create some animosity among Israeli hoops fans. "Seventy-five per cent admire us and 25 per cent hate us," he said.

On the road, the team finds plenty of supporters, particularly in local Jewish communities. But there's also lots of opposition, expressed in a uniquely regional way. "In North America, fans cheer their team. In our region, fans come to hate the other team."

Maccabi has also been faced with angry fans waving the Palestinian flag to taunt them, he said.

When he isn't looking after the team's business affairs, Eshel is an enthusiastic diver. A kibbutznik from Ma'agan Michael, a community about 60 kilometres north of Tel Aviv, Eshel holds the distinction of having uncovered a historic archeological artifact.

The area offshore, he said, is well-known for having been part of a busy trade route in ancient times. On one of his frequent dives, Eshel saw something on the bottom that drew his attention. They were "strange stones" that looked to him out of place. He recovered one and had a geologist examine it. The geologist determined it had originated in Greece or Egypt.

When he went back to the site for another dive, he uncovered the ribbing of an ancient boat, a 2,500-year-old Phoenician craft that had sunk only 200 metres from the coast.

Covered mostly in sand, the boat was extracted after three years of painstaking work. Now housed at the University of Haifa, it is notable for being constructed without nails. Its cargo yielded ceramic jugs, ropes, baskets and boxes of jewelry.

Eshel said he had been diving in the area for years. A marine archeologist he knew was sure an ancient shipwreck would turn up one day and he spent decades searching for one.

"I found the boat one kilometre from his home and he was looking for it for 40 years," Eshel commented.

Leaving home

A few of my best friends have ventured out on their own, taking the huge step of moving out of their parents' nest.

I admired their sense of independence but never felt the same sort of urgency they often described.

"Once you decide that this is best for you, there's no turning back," one of my friends said.

Nothing of note has happened to me in the past year that has forced me to feel this sense of urgency and yet, here I am, in the same spot. It is time for me to move out and my friend was right – there's no turning back.

By SANDIE BENITAH

The decision was difficult to make, but it was a piece of cake compared to breaking the news to my mother. The entire time I felt as if I was going through a horrible emotional breakup.

The first night I decided to move out, I didn't sleep with the nightmares I had about what would happen to me on my own. My instinct told me to run into my mom's room. I stopped myself, not because I wanted to prove to myself that I can do it on my own, but because I knew she would never stop saying, "You see? You need me." And she would be right.

'No matter how old I get, I will always need my parents'

No matter how old I get, I will always need my parents. I can almost guarantee that there will be many nights when I will call, crying for them to come and pick me up after seeing a spider or something. But then I know I will make it through and I will become a stronger, better woman for it.

Of course, no matter how rational that might sound, it still made absolutely no sense to my mother.

"So you want to move to a dungeon where you will have no car and no money because of rent?"

I answered that at some point, I would need to know what it was like not to have someone make me meals and to know what it would be like to take care of myself.

"I'll make you a deal," she said. "I won't make you breakfast or dinner ever again. You can take the bus to work every day instead of the car."

Oh boy. I tried to explain that sometimes I just wanted to come home to silence and have nobody to answer to but myself.

"Okay, when you come in, I'll leave the room," she said. "We can even arrange our schedules so that we never have to see each other."

This woman is obviously way too smart for me, I thought, but looking at her again, I saw that she was sad to lose her baby and didn't want to let go. Deep inside, though, I knew I had reached the point of no return, a huge part of me didn't want to let go, either.

"This isn't a breakup mom," I said, trying to convince myself more than her. "I'm still going to see you all the time."

Then she stuck her lower lip out and I knew there was nothing I could say that would make her change her mind.

I know of so many other parents that count the days until their children move out. For my parents, just as they've always told us, their children are their lives. Now I knew for a fact that it is the truth.

There's no doubt this transition is going to be tough on both my mother and me. All I can hope for is for a little bit of understanding and some forgiveness.

With time, I know my parents will be proud of their baby for finally growing up.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I'm a 43-year-old divorcée, and for the first time in 20 years, I am out there in the singles jungle again. Not only am I out of practice, it seems the rules have changed as well.

This is what I have discovered: the men that I feel would be appropriate for me are somewhere in their 40s, but those men want women in their early 30s. The men that seem to be attracted to me are considerably older.

I'm no beauty queen, but I am a presentable intelligent woman who takes pride in her appearance.

I'm not interested in dating a 60-year-old man. I want someone who grew up in the same era as me.

I knew dating would be tough, but I didn't know how inadequate I would feel. This is really an eye-opening experience. Are my expectations unreasonable?

Not Dating Grandpa

Dear Not Dating Grandpa

Your expectations are reasonable, and the reality of the modern dating scene is not a figment of your imagination.

That's not to say that there aren't men out there looking to date women their own age, but after checking out a number of Internet dating sites, I see the pattern you are talking about.

To me, it's very obvious why older men seek out younger women: it makes them feel young, too. And I'm sure ego also plays a role. Being able to land a much younger woman proves to a man that he still has what it takes (or so he thinks).

There is very little you can do to change the way things have evolved. What you can do, however, is not give up. There are men out there who are looking for their equal in life experience, goals and age. There's something to be said for "growing old together."

Join groups where you can meet people – not necessarily singles groups, but book clubs, lecture series or walking/running groups – or volunteer with an organization. You may meet someone your age with the same interests and passions who is also searching for his soulmate.

Don't give up. Those men are out there somewhere. It's up to you to find them.

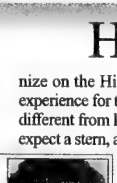
Habonim services 5766

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Habonim is a unique shul. It is one of three truly liberal congregations in the world, one whose mission statement explains that it relies heavily upon social activism and studying the culture and wisdom of the Jewish people.



Eli Rubenstein, an old friend and a brother-in-arms, has been the spiritual leader at Habonim for 18 years. He is well respected and appreciated by the members for his ability to inspire people through his knowledge of Torah, humour and storytelling.

Habonim's sanctuary is not large enough to hold all of its members during the High Holy Days, and two services are held – an early and a late one. This year, I served as a co-spiritual leader with Eli – a great honour. On Yom Kipper, for example, Eli led the early Kol Nidrei service and I led the late one.

Habonim encourages participation by its members and offers them the chance to sermonize on the High Holy Days. This is a superb experience for those who elect to use it, and very different from listening to a rabbi. Generally, we expect a stern, almost parental message from our "spiritual guiding lights," but to hear a personal note from a fellow congregant somehow elicits the response, "Yeh, that's it. He/She is talking about my life."

Some of this year's orators included Dr. Vivian Rakoff, a leading North American therapist and mentor, and community activist and past Habonim president Roger DeFreitas.

DeFreitas spoke passionately about his Jewish experience and Torah learning, encouraging people to commit to reading Jewish writings on such things as the parshah of the week. He stood tall and handsome before 400 individuals and bared his Jewish soul through a well-researched presentation. I watched his family as he spoke. It was obvious his success at that moment was shared by them: his naches was theirs

Habonim's chazzan Esther Ghan Firestone sings in an operatic voice. She is filled with spiritual gusto and compels listeners to close their eyes and wander about in a garden of musical splendour, delving into their own spirit. Her rendition of stirring prayers such as Avinu Malkeinu made us feel as if God was standing next to her. Exquisite. Curiously, at one point, I noticed the security officer perk up his ears, listening with great attentiveness as Firestone concluded with "Ve'imru amen."

Firestone was frequently accompanied by a well-trained choir and shared much of the liturgy with Ilan Muskat – a man with a beautiful Jewish character and a voice that touches the heart.

As the services wound down, David Altman stepped forward grasping his twisting shofar the way Louis Armstrong must have embraced his trumpet. His task was simple – to blow the tekiah gedolah, the lengthy blast to welcome in the new year. He did so brilliantly, as if every breath found its way into his soul from heaven. His tekiah gedolah got stronger, bolder, louder and stronger again.

The lights in the shul were then dimmed and children marched up the aisles with Havdalah candles in their hands, joining the members in this age-old prayer, anticipating the conclusion of the services, seemingly unaware of their hunger pangs.

This was the finale, the final scene at Congregation Habonim High Holy Days 5766. It was potent and commanding and made me think our collective prayers, asking God for a healthy and sweet year, must have been answered in the positive.

People often say Orthodoxy will sustain Judaism. I beg to differ. The congregants at Habonim are proud and committed Jews and bring an important energy to our people. The services at Habonim prove that point very well, and also that all Jews are partners in our future.

MPs plan resolution condemning Iran

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada's four parliamentary parties were expected to pass an all-party resolution earlier this week that condemned statements by the president of Iran, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, calling for the elimination of Israel.

Please see related story on page 38

The resolution, which was to be finalized on Monday morning before The CJN's deadline and presented to Parliament later that day, will clearly express Canadians' opposition to the president's statements and it will urge the government to use its influence at the United Nations to communicate its revulsion to the community of nations, said James Lunney, vice-chair of the Canada-Israel Friendship Group and a Conservative member of Parliament.

The resolution was still being fine-tuned but it is expected it will label the Iranian president's statement as "racist, anti-Semitic, anti-Israel and completely unacceptable," said Marlene Jennings, chair of the friendship group and a member of the Liberal caucus.

Lunney, MP for Nanaimo-Alberni, said the Iranian president's "rhetoric undermines any hope of peace" between Israel and the Palestinians and with the wider Muslim world.

The all-party resolution came after strong statements by Prime Minister Paul Martin and Foreign Minister Pierre Pettigrew condemning the Iranian president's comments. Iran's charge d'affaires was summoned to the Foreign Ministry and reprimanded within three hours of the president's statement being reported.

"It's beyond the pale. It's absolutely incredible," Martin said late last week.

Police Chief Cleared

HAMILTON — Hamilton's Police Services Board has backed Chief Brian Mullan's March trip to Israel after reviewing his report on it at its last meeting. Mullan and other Ontario law enforcement officials went to Israel to learn about its public safety and anti-terror practices. The trip was criticized by local Palestinian groups, and a September board meeting about it ended in chaos. A co-chair of the Niagara Palestinian Association criticized Mullan for consulting local groups before the trip but not naming them in his report, Hamilton Mountain News reported.

Teacher Faces Hearing

TORONTO — A former Catholic high school teacher from Windsor who allegedly told students the Holocaust is an "exaggeration" and insulted gays, Italians, blacks, Catholics and others in class appeared before a disciplinary tribunal of the Ontario College of teachers last week. William Fabel, a history teacher who was fired three years ago by the Windsor-Essex Catholic School Board for allegedly violating the Safe Schools Act, faces charges of professional misconduct and incompetence based on 26 complaints against him. Fabel taught at St. Anne High School in Tecumseh, near Windsor, from 1997 to 2002. He denies all the complaints. His case resumes Nov. 7, the Toronto Star reported.

KINGSTON — A Vienna-born Jew who lived in a PoW camp when he came to Canada in 1940 and later made a fortune in the chemical business has pledged $10 million to his alma mater Queen's University to build a performing arts centre on Kingston's waterfront. Alfred Bader, 81, who earned a PhD at Harvard University after graduating from Queen's in 1945 with a degree in engineering chemistry, has donated a total of $50 million to Queen's, including a Rembrandt painting valued at $10 million, the Kingston Whig-Standard reported. Queen's hopes to buy land along the St. Lawrence River for the arts centre, the paper said.

Nostra Aetate Recalled

ROME — Pope Benedict XVI vowed to strengthen Catholic-Jewish relations as he marked the 40th anniversary last week of the Second Vatican Council's Nostra Aetate document, which absolved Jews of guilt in Jesus' death. "In laying the foundations for a renewed relationship between the Jewish people and the church, Nostra Aetate stressed the need to overcome past prejudices, misunderstandings, indifference and the language of contempt and hostility," Benedict told Jewish and Catholic leaders in Rome, adding that "the Jewish-Christian dialogue must continue to enrich and deepen the bonds of friendship" that developed under his predecessor John Paul II.

Jordan Pulls TV Series

AMMAN — Jordan stopped the airing of an anti-Semitic TV series. Mammou, a private station, had been running Al-Shatat, or The Diaspora, a Syrian-made series that revives such anti-Semitic canards as Jewish world control and blood libel. The Jordanian embassy in Washington said Mammou is on the 84-channel "Free Media Zone" that is not subject to government control. But it said "personal intervention of responsible Jordanians" helped stop the broadcasts. A group of rabbis who met with Jordan's King Abdullah in September urged him to intervene.

AIPAC Defendants Say They'll Call Israelis

WASHINGTON — Defendants in the AIPAC classified information case plan to call Israeli diplomats and a senior U.S. diplomat as witnesses.

In motions filed Oct. 21, lawyers for Steve Rosen and Keith Weissman, two former American Israel Public Affairs Committee staffers, say they plan to call all the people named in indictments as foreign officials and U.S. government officials as witnesses if the case goes to trial. The Israeli Embassy has also been told of the intention.

The indictment speaks of three unnamed foreign officials, all Israeli, JTA has learned. One is Naor Gilon, until this summer the chief political officer at the embassy.

It also speaks of two unnamed U.S. government officials and two unnamed Defence Department officials. JTA has learned that the two government officials are David Satterfield, now deputy U.S. ambassador in Baghdad and a deputy assistant secretary of state in 2002 when he allegedly relayed classified information to Rosen. The other official is Kenneth Pollack, a staffer on ex-president Bill Clinton's national security council and now at a think-tank.

The government has charged Weissman and Rosen under a rarely used statute that bans the relaying of classified information. Their lawyers will argue the practice is common in Washington. Satterfield and Pollack haven't been charged. Israel has said its diplomats behaved correctly in the matter and has offered the prosecution co-operation through written testimony. Trial is set for Jan. 2.

Christian leaders warn churches about divestment dangers

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Four Christian leaders from the United States travelled to Toronto last week to warn Canadian churches of the dangers of divesting in Israel and all its anti-Semitic implications.

B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights hosted the Christian activists at a press briefing to coincide with a three-day conference on "morally responsible" investment in Israel that took place in Toronto from Oct. 26 to 29.

Hosted by Canadian Friends of Sabeel on behalf of the Jerusalem-based Sabeel Ecumenical Liberation Theology Center, the conference brought together an unknown number of registrants, including some from Israel, to explore "the emerging non-violent economic strategies to achieve [a just peace in Israel-Palestine], including shareholder initiatives, partial divestment and boycotts."

Founded about 15 years ago, Sabeel, according to its website, propounds a "Palestinian theology of liberation." Critics say its leader, Anglican clergyman Canon Naim Ateek, has repeatedly characterized Israel with language invoking Jewish complicity in the crucifixion of Jesus.

In July of 2004, the Presbyterian Church USA was the first to pass a resolution to "explore" divestment in Israeli pension funds and in companies which do business in Israel, particularly Caterpillar Inc. and Motorola.

Since then, a growing number of mainline American Protestant churches have voted to do the same.

Jewish activists say the decisions have hurt relations with churches, but that in other instances, Christians are turning away from the divestment drive.

Among the Sabeel conference's sponsors was the United Church of Canada, the country's largest Protestant denomination.

"We're here to alert churches in Canada of entertaining a policy like this," said Sister Ruth Lautt, a Roman Catholic nun and director of Christians for Fair

The GA is coming — who can attend?

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

With an array of Jewish thinkers, leaders and entertainers holding court at Toronto's Metro Toronto Convention Centre from Nov. 13 to 15 at the annual General Assembly of United Jewish Communities (UJC), can the average Torontonian take advantage?

For most people, it's an all-or-nothing proposition. There is a special rate for host community residents to register for the three-day GA – $300, compared to the regular fee of $600 (US). Individuals who are under 30 pay $100 (US). Students also have a discounted rate. Registration closes Nov. 7.

UJC policy, which is set in New York – where the umbrella for Jewish federations in North America is headquartered – does not permit day passes or offer tickets to individual events that are part of the GA.

However, a "Global Jewish Marketplace," featuring Judaica vendors from Israel and North America, is open to the public from 7:30 to 11 p.m. on Sat., Nov. 12, at no charge. The event includes entertainment and refreshments.

For more information on the GA, go to www.ujc.org/ga. A more comprehensive article will appear in next week's CJN.

Read! Support self, authors, industry

From the editor's desk

It says a great deal about the Jewish penchant for assembly and our proclivities for sharing ideas and books, that no sooner have the High and Sukkot Holy Days ended, than communities around the country immediately launch their Holocaust education and Jewish book programs.

We owe a great debt to the individuals and agencies who organize and sponsor the many stirring, thoughtful and simply enjoyable events that compete for limited calendar time and audience loyalty throughout the month of November. Inevitably, there are conflicts in program scheduling that mean we are unable to hear a speaker or two we would have otherwise even missed work to ensure hearing. But such is the price of wide variety and abundant choice.

In Montreal, the Jewish Public Library is the organizing focus of Jewish Book Month. In Toronto, the venue for the annual Jewish book fair (this year, the 29th such fair) is the Leah Posluns Theatre at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

Both programs feature highly esteemed authors – local and international – of great scholarship and compelling intellectual distinction. Rather than enumerate the highlights of the respective programs, however, I urge readers to consult the promotional brochures that are readily available within the community.

Readers of The CJN know that the paper attaches high priority to promoting the reading of books and the celebration of our authors. Three weeks out of four the venerable and sage Bernard Baskin writes about books and related subjects. We also try to have at least one additional page in each issue dedicated to books and authors, not to mention the frequent publication of book reviews by other staff writers.

Who, more than we, know that reading is one of the steady pathways to "building" and supporting one's self? In that process of reading, we also support aspiring as well as established authors. And, of course, we thereby support the publishing industry, which, in Canada, is somewhat of a mitzvah, especially in the cases of the smaller publishing houses.

In that vein, as a demonstration of support for our authors and our publishers, we specifically make reference to the appearances of two Canadian authors: Seymour Mayne, who is speaking in Montreal and Simcha Simchovitch, who will read in Toronto.

By singling out Mayne and Simchovitch we do not intend to prefer them or their programs over any other authors or programs. Though they have both contributed to the pages of The CJN in the past, they stand for all the authors.

Mayne, the author, editor and translator of more than 40 books and monographs, will be reading from his latest collection of poems, Ricochet (Mosaic Press, 2004). The book is a collection of 48 word sonnets, a new form of the traditional sonnet, each comprising 14 lines with one word per line. Mayne has received numerous literary honours, including the J. I. Segal Prize. He is a professor of English and Jewish Canadian studies at the University of Ottawa.

Simchovitch is one of Canada's pre-eminent Yiddishists. He, too, is an award-winning author, scholar, translator and teacher, having last year won the J. I Segal Prize and the Canadian Jewish Book Award.

He will be reading in Yiddish and English, along with Norman Shneidman and Lenka Lichtenberg, from his new book of poems Dos Likht Fun Khesed (Light of Mercy).

A number of Simchovitch's books, although not Light of Mercy, have been brought to the public through the efforts of Howard Aster of Mosaic Press.

Mosaic Press is a wholly owned Canadian publishing house that was founded in 1975 by Michael Walsh and that now has a well-deserved international renown. It publishes about 20 original titles each year in the areas of literature, the arts, social studies and international studies. That Mosaic Press over the years has been generously willing to provide a publishing vehicle for our skilled and multi-talented Canadian writers is deserving of praise and of expressions of gratitude.

The following are some recent, important works published by Mosaic Press:

• Alexander Brott: My Lives in Music, by Alexander Brott and Betty Nygaard King, 2005. This rich autobiography appeared just months before the legendary Canadian composer, conductor, violinist, teacher and musical icon passed away in April.

And in deference to Holocaust Education Week, I specifically mention:

• The Three Tragic Heroes of the Vilnius Ghetto, by N.N. Shneidman, 2002. Shneidman tells the little-known, melancholy tales of Yitzhak Witenberg, Yechiel Sheinbaum and Jacob Gens during their doomed struggles against the Nazis. The book can be read as somewhat of a companion piece to the earlier work by Shneidman, Jerusalem of Lithuania: The Rise and Fall of Jewish Vilnius, published by Mosaic Press in 1998.

• At the Mercy of Strangers: Survival in Nazi-Occupied Poland by Gitel Hopfeld, translated and edited by Simcha Simchovitch. Simchovitch is the author's nephew. This is a powerful, searing book.

• Resistance and Survival: The Jewish Community in Kaunas 1941-1944, by Sara Ginaite-Rubinson. — MBD

War Veterans memorial launched at Earl Bales

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Dignitaries, police brass and soldiers seemed to outnumber civilians last Sunday morning in Earl Bales Park as the Jewish War Veterans of Canada broke ground for their $7-million memorial to Jewish combatants, partisans and resistance fighters.

The monument, on two acres of land donated by the City of Toronto, and designed by world-renowned architect Daniel Libeskind, will be "the most significant war memorial erected in Canada in 50 years," Mayor David Miller told the several hundred people assembled.

It will compare to the National War Memorial in Ottawa and the Vimy Ridge monument in France, Miller said.

Called Flames of Memory, the memorial will honour Canadian Jewish war veterans going back to before Confederation, as well as Allied countries and members of the Resistance during World War II.

Set back from Bathurst Street, about 250 metres north of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial, it is planned as a sweeping, curved structure resembling a chanukiyah that gradually ascends to five storeys, topped by eight lights.

Slicing through the middle will be an arrow-like structure that carries the "shamash," which will act as an eternal flame.

Film about village that hid Jews opens program

Holocaust Education Week celebrating 25th anniversary

please see related stories pages 32-36

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Holocaust Education Week opened last Thursday night with an examination of good and evil, and why the former is often in a plain wrapper.

The heroism of ordinary people was lauded in the program before a packed hall at Temple Sinai, where Pierre Sauvage, writer, producer and director of the award-winning 1987 documentary Weapons of the Spirit, spoke of the remarkable events that took place in his birthplace: a small Protestant village in the middle of Catholic France that has become synonymous with collective courage.

From 1940 to '44, the 5,000 rugged denizens of the farming community of Le Chambon-sur-Lignon, spurred only by their biblical morality and sense of natural justice, hid an equal number of Jews from the Nazi occupiers, proving, as Sauvage noted, that during the Holocaust, "you stood a better chance of being rescued by peasants than professors."

The villagers were proud descendants of the Huguenots, France's first Protestants and knew their own share of persecution. Their rescue was not an organized effort, Sauvage said, but the result of a free-floating goodness that was anchored in their deep Christian faith and plain sense of right and wrong.

The filmmaker presented a 35-minute "classroom" version of his 90-minute documentary. Located in Vichy France, about 500 kilometres south of Paris, Le Chambon began sheltering Jews soon after the country fell to Hitler in the spring of 1940. They were billeted in farm houses, hostels and pensions.

The taciturn locals didn't need much convincing. Asked on camera by Sauvage why they risked their lives for strangers, most of the aged rescuers simply shrugged, answering, virtually in unison, that they didn't really know – it was just the right thing to do. The Jews were "God's people," and the Gospels command the righteous to feed the hungry, care for the sick and love one's neighbour as oneself.

"It took me years to understand," said the Los Angeles-based Sauvage, "that the shrug of a shoulder is worth more than a whole speech."

Spurred by their pastor, the passivist André Trocmé, the village kept receiving Jews, until the two populations equalled each other.

Even after the Germans occupied southern France in late 1942, Trocmé urged his flock to keep at it. "The responsibility of Christians," he said, "is to resist the violence that will be brought to bear on their consciences through the weapons of the spirit." The pastor tapped his cousin, Daniel, to run a refugee house for Jewish children that was later raided by the Nazis. Daniel Trocmé was deported and murdered at Majdanek in 1944.

Other than that, the German army, which set up operations literally across the street from the headquarters of the resistance in Le Chambon, let the situation lie. There is "ample evidence," Sauvage stated, to suggest that the German officer in charge knew what was going on, but turned a blind eye, and was even welcomed back to the village in a postwar visit.

Except for another village in the Netherlands, nowhere else in occupied Europe did a successful moral consensus develop on the scale approaching what happened in Le Chambon, Sauvage pointed out.

For the filmmaker, who was born as a hidden child in the village in 1943, the film offers a motherlode of moral lessons.

"No time is completely black," he said. "You cannot measure darkness without something to contrast it to."

It is goodness that provides the yardstick: "Good makes us accountable. We have to measure ourselves next to goodness. Next to evil, we come off smelling like a rose."

It was only at the age of 18 that he learned that he and his family were Jewish and survivors of the Holocaust. His experience "didn't make me religious, but it did make my children Jews."
